

THE CALL TO WORLD SERVICE

The World Service program herewith presented, is worthy of the most careful, sympathetic, and generous support of all our people. It has been my privilege to observe closely the preparation of this great document. In my judgment, no similar presentation of the world-wide needs and opportunities of the Methodist Episcopal Church has heretofore been made. For a statesmanlike view of our total task, for careful analysis of our problems, for inspiring suggestions as to the unparalleled openings for world service, no equally comprehensive and accurate document has gone out to the church.

Every survey has been studied, revised where necessary, and treated with business sagacity as well as with prophetic vision. The best I can wish for the church is that this commanding volume may be studied as carefully as it has been prepared.

The Word of the Lord to the people called Methodists is that they go forward.

We are more nearly approximating the whole program of Jesus Christ for this world than ever before. The world is giving gratifying response to that appeal. Membership is growing, children and young people are crowding our modern buildings in ever increasing hundreds, property values are enormously increasing, more serviceable plants are constantly appearing, and the spirituality of our churches is deepening.

We look forward with confident hope. We trust the church to recognize the privileges and the obligations of stewardship and to respond with willing sacrifice and devotion which will gladden the Lord and Master of us all.

JOHN WESLEY

FOREWORD

Methodism is on the march! This is normal. A militant church does not stand still. Wesley marshaled forces for a fresh crusade. Asbury outdistanced his religious compeers. Simpson and McCabe challenged to larger advance. Thoburn, Bashford, Lewis thought in terms of Christ's continental conquests.

God gave to S. Earl Taylor, one of the secretaries of the Board of Foreign Missions, a vision of the greater work He had for the people called Methodists. After a tour of inspection to many parts of the world in company with John F. Goucher and other leaders, Taylor challenged the church to undertake more seriously the Christian possibilities of the generation.

This movement has been known as the Methodist Centenary. Three Methodisms united: the Methodist Church of Canada, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and our own. This was the pioneer of other similar movements which were initiated almost simultaneously by several Protestant denominations.

Authorized by the General Conference at Saratoga Springs, in 1916, a purposeful celebration of one hundred years of our missionary effort was proposed. Pursuant to this action, a World Program Committee of one hundred was constituted and met in significant session at Niagara Falls, September 17-19, 1917.

The Centenary Program was based on world surveys in both home and foreign fields revealing needs of a five-year period making it necessary to secure $80,000,000. The reconstruction work following the World War added $25,000,000. The inclusion of the other general benevolent boards increased the total to $115,000,000. This huge sum was intensively solicited on a five-year basis, and was for the most part generously subscribed in a campaign which, culminating May 31, 1919, was a marvel to the religious and financial world.

In 1920, the General Conference changed the organization to the Council of Boards of Benevolence with the Committee on Conservation and Advance as its active promotional agent. Headquarters were established in Chicago. Up to April 1, 1923, a total of $55,878,201.78 has been collected and paid to the various causes.

Midway of the Centenary period, November 15-17, 1921, a unique, unforgettable National Conference was held in Detroit. The call read "On the Highway of God we are: we pause not for repairs or adjustments, but to decide the direction of our going." "The World's Need and Our Reply" was the general theme.

In the Council immediately following was born the idea of the Committee of Twenty-Five on Advance or Post-Centenary Program. Early and vigorously did this carefully constituted committee undertake the tremendous task. New studies of the world's need were instituted and the sub-committees worked on the problems of evangelism, lay activities, stewardship, education, and our charted benevolent responsibility.

After days of preparation on January 11, 1923, the sub-committee on New Studies and other sub-committees reported in detail to the Committee of Twenty-Five. A most significant composite report was prepared for the Council and, after full discussion, was adopted without change by a practically unanimous vote. This historic occasion was characterized by a sense of deep devotion, high obligation, and Kingdom responsibility.

The church through properly constituted human authority and, we believe, by divine direction, has determined to meet the world's agonizing cry for the gospel by a new advance, a fresh and continuous attack on evil, a truer exposition of the Christ ideal.

The world can be set in order. Christ is the solution. The World Service Program exalts him.

Distribution of Methodist Episcopal churches in Eastern Asia. The Japan Methodist Church is included.

GRADUATES OF PEKING UNIVERSITY

The real problem of the Pacific is the problem of the transformation of the mind of China, of the capacity of the oldest and most complicated civilization of the globe to remake itself into the new forms required by the impact of immense alien forces.

JOHN DEWEY

EASTERN ASIA

AFTER THREE-QUARTERS OF A CENTURY

The first missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church to reach Eastern Asia landed in China in 1847. Twenty-six years later work began in Japan. Twelve years after that the first station was opened in Korea.

There are eight annual conferences and one mission conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Eastern Asia today. In addition, there is the Japan Mission Council, supervising work in Japan and among Japanese in Korea, and the Japan Methodist Church, a union of the three bodies of Methodists that formerly carried on work in that empire.

A total Christian community of 132,984 represents the ingathering of these first seventy-five years. Of the preachers, 475 are full members of conferences, and 141 more are on trial. Four hundred and thirty-eight local preachers and 651 exhorters hold appointments, with several thousand additional Chinese, Japanese, and Korean workers.

Episcopal residences are located in Peking, Shanghai, Foochow, and Seoul.

A PERIOD OF OPPORTUNITY

Political, geographical, social, and racial differences make the problems affecting work in Japan, Korea, and China dissimilar. In the main, however, it can be said that all three are passing through a period of transition, and that with this there is given such an opportunity for Christian service as has never been offered before.

In no part of these fields, once so tightly closed, is there any lack of interest in the gospel. In fact, the amazing eagerness everywhere encountered constitutes one of the most embarrassing features of the situation.

ENTERING MANCHURIA

The time is ripe for advance into Manchuria by the Methodist Episcopal Church. This vast province of China has felt the full impact of foreign forces, both Japanese and Western.

The Methodist Episcopal Church must have its attention directed thither because large numbers of its members have emigrated there from Korea and North China. In Harbin, the managing director of the Chinese Eastern Railway, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a graduate of Methodist schools in Peking, has joined with many others in petition that Methodist work be extended to this region.

After careful investigation by parties from Korea and China, the Methodist Episcopal Church has decided to enter Manchuria. The program adopted is conservative. It is expected that a large part of the field will be opened by workers supported by the native churches in China and Korea. The program as approved for 1925 reads:

Missionary Staff:

No missionaries required in Manchuria.

CHINA

IN THE EYES OF THE WORLD

A nation that cannot be hid.—Why are you interested in China?

Why do American newspapers give so much space to China?

Why were the governments of the world willing to submit their plans to a Washington Conference dealing with the problems of China?

Because—

The problems of China are the heart of the problems of the Far East.

And—

The problems of the Far East are the heart of the problems of future world peace.

It is instinct that rivets world attention on China. From that land will come good or ill for us all. That is why we are interested in China.

China and world peace.
—There was a time when China seemed a helpless victim in the hands of any exploiter. That time has passed. It passed on the day when the first graduates went from modern high schools to begin the formation of a Chinese public opinion. The public opinion of a quarter of the human race, knowing that it has been victimized and de-terminated not to be victimized again, is not something with which to trifle.

China has small power wherewith to resist exploitation from without. Small active power, that is. But she has enormous passive resistance. This she is ready to apply over centuries, if need be, making herself such an uncomfortable member of the family of nations that, in the long run, in desperation they will grant her justice.

But from within she faces grave dangers. Many believe internal disintegration has started. And a disintegration that plagues what is one of the world's oldest civilizations, as well as the world's largest nation, is bound to plague all. The world is too small to contain international disease anywhere and not be menaced everywhere.

What will help China?—Faced by this world danger, the nations ask how China may be brought to full health.

Some say that China needs to be let alone. She needs a chance to work out her own problems. That is true. But isolation is as impossible for China as for any other modern nation.

Some say that China needs diplomatic aid. That is also true. But it takes small knowledge of history to know how restricted and how doubtful are the benefits of diplomacy.

The port of Foochow, where, in 1847, the first two missionaries of our church landed

Some say that China needs a development of her natural resources: new wealth will bring a higher standard of living. That, too, is true. But such development in other parts of the earth has often brought losses that more than balance the gains.

Some say that China needs education for her masses. This need is, beyond question, immediate, imperative. But there have been examples in both East and West to prove that education, in itself, is no insurance of national health.

All agree that China needs something. The leaders of the "New Tide of Thought," that movement now penetrating to the vitals of Chinese life and there producing upheaval, say that China needs a new study of all her ancient sanctions, a new atmosphere in which her people may think new thoughts, live on new levels, achieve a new command of latent forces. In other words, that China must have an inner transformation.

That paragraph summarizes the reason for and challenge to the Christian enterprise in China.

THE STORY OF SEVENTY-FIVE YEARS

Where Methodism entered China.—Protestant Christianity, like every influence that came to China from the West, entered from the South.

Robert Morrison gave the adventure its first foothold in 1807 at Canton. Forty years later the first two missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church landed in the teeming port of Foochow (see picture at the left) five hundred miles farther north along the coast.

The record of the early years makes heart-breaking reading. Death, disease, fierce opposition, internal uprisings that scattered the missionaries, all conspired to make the work seem fruitless. In ten years the devoted efforts of some of the best missionaries who ever labored for the Methodist Episcopal Church gained not a single convert!

Then, at the end of the first decade, the tide turned. The first convert was baptized! A few weeks later the name of his wife was inscribed as that of the first woman to be baptized by the Methodist Episcopal Church in China. By the end of that year thirty-eight adults and three children had been gathered in the group. With a church, schools, a press, medical work, members, probationers, class-meetings, quarterly meetings, the mission was finally established and started upon its memorable career.

That was seventy-five years ago.

How the occupation spread.—Ten years sees a permanent foothold won at Foochow. Two years more and the work has spread fifteen miles up the Min River from that city. At the same time the pioneers of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society arrive, and special work for women and girls starts. Six Chinese local preachers are licensed, the first in that magnificent line of men who have, when called upon, proved faithful unto death.

We cannot follow the spread of the work in detail. Take a map of China, and check off by twenty-year intervals:

1860—And the work is huddled in and about the city of Foochow, just a dot on the map of Fukien province.

1880—and the work is begun in four provinces, spreading out from Foochow to much of Fukien; at two of the recently opened ports on the Yangtse River; around the capital, Peking; at the foot of China's sacred mountain in Shantung.

1900—the Boxer year! And that scourge finds the church spreading through the provinces where it has previously been found, athwart the Yangtse in the provinces of Anwhei and Kiangsi, and leaping a thousand miles westward to the heart of the largest and wealthiest of all the provinces, Szechuen.

1920—the Centenary! No new provinces, but great new stretches of territory in all the provinces entered. Isolated stations linked. Centers of occupation carefully planned with reference to the new routes of travel that the railroad and the modern steamship are opening. The total responsibility of the Methodist Episcopal Church faced, and plans laid to meet it!

Chinese Methodism today.—Wonderful is the record of these seventy-five years! Not only is the church established in seven provinces, and in such cities as Peking, Tientsin, Nanking, Chungking, Chengtu, Nanchang, and Foochow, but there are seven annual conferences and one mission conference, with more than 2,500 full-time Chinese workers, more than 90,000 members and baptized adherents, and more than 60,000 Sunday-school pupils.

The scope of the work being carried on by the Methodist Episcopal Church in China is not to be exceeded by any Christian body in any part of the world. It ranges from varied forms of preaching and teaching to philanthropic services to widely differing communities, with efforts to aid in the transformation of the conditions of thought and life that hamper many sections. It is specialized work, in the best sense of that term. And it is constantly attempting new modes of service.

Most significant of all is the fact that this seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of Methodist work in China finds the church in that country increasingly under Chinese leadership. Three generations of effort are yielding their fruit in men and women who, as preachers, teachers, writers, executives, are proving competent to carry the enterprise rapidly to such triumphs as it has yet to know. The Methodist Episcopal Church in China has in its ranks, as laymen and as ministers, as capable men and women as are to be found in any part of the world's Methodism.

EMERGING CHINA

Where world movements start.—Everywhere the nations feel the impulse of new forces. Since the Centenary was launched the political aspect of much of the world has changed. In that day men were not talking much about the passing of monarchism, the resurgence of Islam, the emergence of communism, or the rising tide of color. Yet these are the great factors to be faced today.

It is possible that when some H. G. Wells of the twenty-first century summarizes the history of our times he will point to China as the place where the present world upheaval began. Perhaps he will date the beginning in 1900 when China, through the Boxers, made the last attempt of the East to resist the forces of the West. Or perhaps he will date it in 1911 when the Manchus were driven from their throne, and China raised the torch of democracy amidst the immemorial darkness of Asia.

There have been revolutions or major attempts at revolution in twenty-nine countries since 1911. The revolution in that year has proved a prelude to a world upheaval.

What brought the revolution?—Why was China ready to break with the governmental traditions of forty centuries? Many causes contributed. There was the increasing inefficiency of the Manchu rule in the face of the constant encroachment from without. There was the increasing influence of western ideas, particularly in student circles. And probably Yuan Shih Kai, the first president of the republic, was right when he told a missionary that the overthrow of the throne came as an inevitable result of the preaching of human brotherhood and equality before God.

It was significant that the revolution found strong support among Chinese Christians. During these years of turmoil, when the ideals of the revolution have frequently seemed about extinguished, these same Christian communities have frequently proved themselves, quietly but determinedly, devoted to the coming of a new day.

The struggle for control.—Events in China in the last dozen years cannot easily be summarized. Inevitably there has been an inner struggle for control between conservatives and progressives. More and more the conservative voice has come to be that of a blind, irresponsible, ruthless militarism. The most hopeful fact in any consideration of China's future is that the voice of scholar and student, once most conservative, is now progressive.

When the revolution of 1911 opened the way for a new government, an Oriental compromise gave the conservatives, in the person of Yuan Shih Kai, the offices, while the progressives were allowed to write the constitution. The experience of later years proved that the control of offices and army was everything and the paper constitution nothing when actual governing was at stake.

The struggle has, therefore, been one to secure a government in which power should reside in the hands of those who uphold a national law, rather than in the hands of military swashbucklers who are a law unto themselves. The figures that have flitted so rapidly across the Chinese scene have all been ranged on one side or the other of this struggle.

The revolution in China is still a long way from success. Days come frequently when China's well-wishers despair. But there are these encouraging facts to keep ever in mind:

Slowly but surely the power of the militarists is passing.

Slowly but surely the progressive, educated young patriots are becoming most potent figures.

China has 1,500,000 men under arms

Slowly but surely the revolution is penetrating far below the political surface to change China's life all the way down to its foundations.

The making of the new China is a varied adventure. Some of it is political, but more is below that surface. All of it makes up the challenge that Christianity now faces in that land.

NEW CHINA'S GOVERNMENT

China in arms.—The anomaly of present conditions in China is to be found in the fact that while the Chinese are the most pacific of peoples, there are more of them now under arms than in any other country, with the possible exception of France.

It is impossible to tell exactly how large are the armies of China. Every new military uprising proclaims its intention to reduce the number of soldiers, and recruits new brigades. Since troops hold their allegiance to individual leaders, while those leaders are practically without control from any central government, it is impossible to stop this recruiting. A conservative estimate would place the number of soldiers in China today at 1,500,000.

Chinese detest these armies as the scourge of their country. Unpaid for long periods, the troops collect a living by levies on towns and looting. In parts of the country where soldiers have been employed to put down banditry, inhabitants have soon come to profess a preference for the bandits.

Shifting battle lines.—Groups of these soldiers engage in campaigns every summer. We cannot trace in detail the shifting fortunes of these internal wars since the founding of the republic. The bloody business is a result of a weak central government, bound to be dominated by whatever general can place his troops in the most advantageous position.

Generals thus form into cliques, hoping by combining strength to advance the personal fortunes of each member. But when any member acquires too much power, the other generals combine to bring down the emerging figure. This, in a few words, roughly expresses the course of the fighting in China during the past five years.

Behind and within all this maneuvering of individual generals and military cliques, is to be seen the struggle between republicanism and reaction. Certain of the generals who have recently achieved eminence, notably Wu Pei-fu and Feng Yü-hsiang, are known as favorable to the progressive cause. It is doubtful, however, whether that cause can be established through the services of any of the irresponsible generals, however well-intentioned they may be.

What of the future?—It is hazardous to prophesy China's political future. It is possible that the present internal chaos will degenerate into general anarchy, when even a pretense of self-government will be impossible. But if this is not to happen, along what lines may the new China hope to win her way to political stability?

Hope for the future probably lies in the strengthening of the government of the provinces. Already some of them have shown strength enough to expel the military adventurers who have exploited them, and set up administrations composed of local officials. This beginning may develop into a movement whereby China will become legally what it is in tradition, a collection of largely autonomous provinces, confederated only to provide a central administration to represent it in dealing with foreign affairs.

The Christian contribution.—Has the church any part in this effort to provide China with a workable democratic form of government? From the interplay of personal rivalries and clique intrigues it needs not be said that the church must stand sternly aloof. But there is one contribution that the church may make. If it does not make it, China's friends fail to see from what source she is to be supplied.

China's fundamental political need is worthy leaders. To be sure, that is the need of every country, but in a country in China's disorganized condition, the need is especially pressing. Unless she can find men who will stand true to high personal and political ideals, who will sink all other interests in favor of the welfare of the whole, who can move easily in the mental currents of the world at large, China is in a bad way.

The Christian church must supply these men, or they will not be found.

NEW CHINA'S RESOURCES

Railroads and the coolie.—There are less than 8,000 miles of railroad in China. That means little until it is interpreted in terms of human labor. Then it is seen to doom millions of Chinese to an existence little better than that of beasts of burden.

Mr. Julean Arnold, speaking as the responsible commercial agent of the United States, translates the meaning of China's undeveloped transportation in these terms: "If we (Americans) had to hire coolie-carriers to carry the freight, not to mention the one billion passengers carried, which American railways hauled last year, it would take twice the present estimated population of China, or 800,000,000 men, each man carrying 160 pounds fifteen miles a day for 365 working days."

A Chinese coolie is a horse for work

No wonder that observers hold that the first requisite for a proper development of China's resources is an adequate system of transportation. Mr. Arnold has estimated that there must be 50,000 additional miles of railway before this development can be completed. Others have pointed out that there is a need for good roads as pressing as that for railways.

This lack of transportation directly affects the problem of food supply, which is of such importance in China. China's farmers are admittedly among the best in the world. In the province of Shensi, for example, they raise thirty to forty bushels of wheat to the acre from land that has been producing similar crops for forty centuries. But, as matters now stand, it is cheaper to move wheat 7,000 miles from Seattle to Hankow than the 600 miles from Shensi.

The lure of raw materials.—It is a new China, with new problems, that will come when this problem of transportation is solved, and trains and trucks carry the loads now borne by men and barrows. And this change is bound to come quickly, for it is now known that China's soil is packed with the raw materials that this industrial age most covets.

Reports of China's coal and iron deposits have probably been exaggerated. It is certain, however, that she possesses enough of these two requisites for a modern industrial state to make it possible to compete with the output of any other nation.

The coal reserve is probably from forty to fifty billion tons, or thirty-three per cent of that of Great Britain. More than a third of this is anthracite, in contrast to the condition in the rest of the world, where anthracite comprises only one-eighth of the supply. Since it is possible to mine this coal for not more than 75 cents a ton (U. S. gold) it can be seen that when transportation brings it cheaply to the place of use there may be a marked effect upon world commerce.

The iron reserve is estimated at a billion tons, or about four-fifths of that of Great Britain, a third of that of France or Germany before the war, or a quarter of that of the United States.

Of other resources, China holds more than half the world's antimony; ranks after the Malay States and Bolivia in her wealth of tin; is already third in cotton production; and will produce increasing tungsten, molybdenum, manganese, lead, zinc, petroleum, silk, vegetable oils (notably those from the soya bean), and flour. Large deposits of limestone and the other ingredients of Portland cement make good roads possible.

To a world frantically seeking to restore a shattered industrial life, the lure of such wealth is compelling. Let one theorize as may be, it is certain that commercial pressure will force the development of such resources before many more years pass. The welfare of China's people, and the peace of the world, is wrapped in the basis upon which this development takes place.

material resources will come from the same lands from which have come Christian missionaries. It is therefore imperative that nothing be done in the name of such development that will deny the principles Christians have proclaimed.

For this reason it behooves all Christian churches to make clear their attitude toward the commercial and industrial development of such lands as China. A Christian platform would seem to demand:

1. That no development take place upon terms unacceptable to the Chinese people.

2. That no development take place upon terms that would rob the Chinese people, either temporarily or permanently, of the wealth that should be theirs.

3. That no development take place upon terms that would place the value of the product above the welfare of the worker.

Churches in all lands must unite with the church in China to secure from governments guarantees that their nationals will embark upon the development of China's resources only on this basis. This is but one example of the manner in which the broadening implications of the Christian program require missionary service in so-called Christian lands as well as overseas.

NEW CHINA'S INDUSTRY

The shift to manufacturing. — Thirty years ago there was not a factory chimney in China. Today the country is filled with manufacturing plants producing goods that already compete with Western products in the markets of the world.

A far from complete list of establishments shows that there are now in China cotton mills, oil mills, flour mills, woolen mills, silk mills, saw mills, paper mills, canneries, iron foundries, steel works, shipbuilding works, knitting works, printing works, smelting works, glass works, water works, brick works, electric light plants, packing houses, tanneries, lace and hair net factories, match factories, sugar factories, cigarette factories, furniture factories, porcelain factories, railway shops, egg-drying factories, distilleries, breweries, arsenals.

There are at least twelve cities in China that are centers of modern industrialism. Some of these, such as Wusih and Nantungchow, were insignificant villages a few years ago. The growth of Shanghai from a collection of fishermen's huts to a population of more than a million, with the promise of becoming ultimately the world's largest city, has taken place in less time than the growth of Chicago.

When the United States entered the nineteenth century it was ninety per cent agricultural. In 1910 only thirty-three per cent of its population lived on the farm. When China entered the twentieth century it was ninety per cent agricultural. If a shift to manufacturing involving a third of these takes place during the century (a conservative estimate) more than the entire present population of the United States will be affected! Taking into consideration what such shifts have meant in other lands, who can estimate the power with which this vast migration will shake the life of the world?

The cotton industry offers striking illustration of the way in which a new industrial China is coming into being. The number of cotton factories jumped from 49 in 1919 to 102 in 1922, with about 1,500,000 spindles producing approximately 300,000,000 pounds of yarn a year.

The steel works at Hanyang have become of sufficient importance to warrant the Japanese in challenging the British claim to a "sphere of influence" in that region.

China is still predominantly agricultural. It will remain so for another century. But the shift from the country to the city and from the soil to the machine has definitely begun. It is disturbing the whole tenor of Chinese life. Ultimately it is bound to affect the life of all the world.

What sort of mills?—With Chinese by the millions turning to the mills for a livelihood it is necessary to ask concerning the nature of this industrialism that is to influence the East. It is probably no exaggeration to say that, for sheer brutality, the Chinese factory system cannot be surpassed in any other part of the world. Conditions in most of the mills are such that a disinterested observer cannot obtain entrance.

The factory system of China makes enormous use of the labor of women and children. Figures gathered by Mr. Julean Arnold, the commercial attaché of the United States, and by Mr. M. T. Tchou, show that, in the cotton industry, forty per cent of the workers are women, forty per cent children, and only twenty per cent men. In Chinese industry as a whole, including the many forms in which it is impossible to use child and woman labor, these same authorities have estimated that fifteen per cent of the workers are women and twenty per cent are children!

Small chance have they to secure an abundant life, slaving as they must in a Shanghai cotton mill

To these workers starvation wages are doled out. Mr. Arnold states that the average wage of men millworkers, in terms of American money, is from 15 to 20 cents a day; of women from 10 to 12½ cents; of children from 5 to 10 cents. Mr. Tchou quotes actual figures from the silk mills of Shanghai, the most highly paid center in China, to show that the pay of skilled women weavers is from 18 to 20 cents a day; of unskilled from 14 to 17½ cents; of girls from 7½ to 10 cents.

Sanitary conditions within many of the factories are notoriously bad, although some new plants show an improvement. Hours of labor are long, the average being a twelve-hour shift. More than seventy per cent of all the workers in China work seven days in a week.

Sickness and mortality figures among these workers are, of course, frightfully high. So high that, in the absence of detailed statistics, it is unwise to make estimates.

The cause of such exploitation.—Why is such a merciless industrialism allowed to come into existence, with the warning of Western experience in plain view? Simply because men are willing to bring any ruin upon their successors, as well as their employees, if they may thereby obtain a quick profit.

The following extract is from a trade paper and requires no comment:

The profits of the ———— factory again surpass $1,000,000. To those who bestow thought on the progress of textile industries in China, the following particulars concerning this concern may be of interest. The company was started in 1904 with a paid up capital of $600,000, divided into 6,000 shares of $100 each. The capital was increased to $900,000 in 1916. . . . For the past two years it has been running night and day without intermission. . . . The working hours are from 5:30 a. m. to 5:30 p. m. and from 5:30 p. m. to 5:30 a. m. respectively. No meals are supplied by the factory. Most of the cotton used is produced locally. . . . It will be seen that the company is in an exceptionally favorable position. With the raw product at its door, an abundant and absurdly cheap labor supply to draw on, and no vexatious factory laws to observe, it is not surprising that its annual profits should have exceeded its total capital on at least three occasions.

No, it is not surprising. But it will be surprising if there is no price paid for exploitation of this sort.

The worst of it is that so much of this sort of industrialism is the result of the demand of western capital for quick and large returns. For example, forty-six per cent of the cotton mills of China are foreign owned.

A rising tide of protest.—Inevitably the Chinese are forming to combat exploitation of this sort. The growth in the labor union movement in China during the past two years has been astonishing. The ancient guilds, which were really associations of merchants and manufacturers, having proved unable to protect the workers, the workers have undertaken their own protection. Great success has attended their efforts.

In Hongkong in 1921 Chinese sailors struck for better treatment and higher wages. Sympathetic strikes that finally involved practically all the Chinese in the city brought the foreign steamship companies to terms, but not until 275 ships, totaling 250,000 tons, had been held in harbor for weeks.

After that victory, sixty labor unions were formed in Shanghai within a few months. In the cities of Canton and Chaochow, industrial centers of southern China, more than fifty strikes occurred in the first nine months of 1922. More than nine-tenths of these were successful, bringing wage increases of from ten to forty per cent.

The determination of the Chinese workman was shown on the northern branch of the Canton-Wuchang railway, when an attempt to run trains under military guard was foiled by the strikers throwing themselves on the rails until more than a hundred had been injured and killed.

The labor unions are now backing a list of nineteen demands, ranging all the way from recognition of the right of labor to organize to the obligation of the government to provide adequate education to all workers. These they desire to see inserted in the permanent constitution of the republic, as soon as that document is framed.

The Christian contribution. — While many of these demands of labor will not be realized at the present time, and much labor unrest is a result of demagogic appeal by unworthy leaders, the growth of a labor movement to protect China's millions against a rapacious industrialism is a phenomenon that cannot be ignored. No enterprise that hopes to share largely in the shaping of the future China can neglect this.

Rightly, the Christian forces are bestirring themselves to deal with the matter. The meeting of the World's Christian Student Federation, held in Peking in 1922, was marked by earnest discussion of the problems of industry. And at the National Christian Conference, held in the same year, one of the three subjects that were brought to the floor for direct action by the delegates was the adoption of a resolution pledging the church in China to work for the ultimate establishment of the labor standards set by the League of Nations, and for the immediate adoption of this platform:

1. No employment of children under twelve years of age.
2. One day's rest in seven.
3. Safeguarding the worker's health by the limitation of working hours, improvement of working conditions, and installation of safety devices.

Nor is this concern to confine itself to the passing of resolutions. Already the Chambers of Commerce of Peking and Chefoo, important industrial centers, have been induced to adopt the church's program for their industries. The same effort will be carried to the other parts of China.

NEW CHINA'S EDUCATION

The word of an American thinker.—“We talk glibly about the importance of the problem of the Pacific, and even the schoolboy can quote Seward, Hay, and Taft. But what do we suppose this problem to be? One that concerns a superficial waste of mobile waters? No, the real problem of the Pacific is the problem of the transformation of the mind of China, of the capacity of the oldest and most complicated civilization of the globe to remake itself into the new forms required by the impact of immense alien forces.”

John Dewey said that.

Difficulties to be overcome.—But when you attempt “to transform the mind of China” you face the most difficult educational task in history. Only the necessity of its accomplishment, which Professor Dewey has stated so clearly, nerves men to attempt it.

What are these difficulties?

She is a living symbol of China's dire poverty
—a rag picker

1. There is the poverty of the people. Investigation has shown that, in Shanghai, with the cost of living demanding an income for a single man of at least $11.85 (Mexican) a month and for a family of five of at least $21.34, more than 40 per cent of the population live below this line. In North China more than half the people live below a standard that is 20 per cent under that in Shanghai. Such poverty requires every possible contribution from every possible hand, and cannot leave children in school long enough to give them even the rudiments of an education.

2. There is the difficulty of the language. The substitution of a new written form of Chinese for the old classical style (see the section on “White Language”) materially reduces the time needed to make one a master of ordinary literary forms, but Chinese, without an alphabet, remains a language requiring intense concentration.

3. There is the difficulty of conservatism. To be sure, the suspicion with which modern education was once regarded has largely passed in China. But some remains, particularly in reference to the education of girls.

Two of the 100,000,000 Chinese children who should be in school

4. There is the difficulty of the mass. With at least 100,000,000 who should be in school, it can be seen that the provision of teachers and equipment will require years and large appropriations.

5. There is the difficulty inherent in changing educational standards. However desirous Chinese may be for a new type of education, better pedagogy does not come overnight. A majority of the primary schools are still of a miscellaneous nature that makes their work of problematic value.

Government plans and performance.—In the new China there are scores of enthusiasts who are working to overcome these difficulties and transform China's mind with a modern type of education. Many of these have become educational specialists in postgraduate schools in America, Europe, and Japan. Some of them have entered the Ministry of Education. Under their influence a well-balanced educational program has been adopted.

This program provides for universal education in a system that begins in the kindergarten, passes through eight or nine years in the lower and higher primary school, through four more years in the middle school, then branches off to normal school or junior college, senior college, and university technical school. Education, at least in the lower primary school, is supposed to be compulsory.

Nowhere is there a better balanced national program of education. When it is finally carried into effect it will give China one of the best systems of public schools in the world. Up to date, however, so much of the national revenue has gone for the support of China's militarists that almost nothing has remained wherewith to bring this plan into being. Most of the national program remains on paper.

A false impression is created, however, if this failure to achieve all the ends in view is emphasized. Rather, it should be pointed out that, working almost without funds, either to provide school buildings or to pay teachers, more than 4,000,000 students have actually been enrolled in public schools, while a decade ago there were certainly not more than a million in schools of any kind. Also, there are 200 government normal schools, with an average enrolment of 150, insuring that the area of educational operations can constantly be broadened.

The Christian contribution.—From the first, Christian workers have recognized their obligation to assist in the transformation of the mind of China. Indeed, it is not too much to say that such measure of transformation as has been achieved is largely the result of the service rendered by the pioneer schools established by the missionaries.

It is clear that the church can never hope to provide even rudimentary education for 100,000,000 young Chinese. Nor should it. That is the government's job. The task confronting the Christian forces is the conducting of schools that shall set the models for all other schools. By making these model schools positively Christian, the Christian touch can be kept on all Chinese education, even after the overwhelming majority of schools are supported by the government.

METHODIST SCHOOLS IN CHINA

The sort of schools.—In confronting its present educational opportunity in China the Methodist Episcopal Church is seeking to do just this—not to make many schools, but to make good schools. One of the last statements made by Bishop Wilson S. Lewis declared:

"Faulty principles of pedagogy, incompetent teachers, illy equipped educational institutions constitute an unspeakable menace to the propagation of the true religion of Jesus Christ. Illogical and unadapted courses of study are a reproach to our intelligence and our piety. Our opportunity is to build models of such excellence both in type and quality as to challenge the best yet known. One institution well located, well equipped, thoroughly furnished, is worth an unlim-

The Methodist program of education follows that laid down by the government. There are about 1,200 schools of all grades, including those conducted by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. Thirty thousand pupils are in the lower and about 6,000 in the higher primary schools. Three thousand are in the middle schools, a term corresponding to the American high school. Seven hundred are in college. The rest are in technical training schools of various kinds.

The crown of the school system is to be found in the union universities, in which the Methodist Episcopal Church co-operates at Peking, Tsinan, Nanking, Chengtu, and Foochow with other American, Canadian, and British bodies to provide as high a type of education as is to be found in China today. The colleges for women in Peking, Nanking, and Foochow also are outstanding institutions. Here is Christianity's supreme opportunity to put its imprint upon the best educated of China's future leaders.

The sort of students.—What sort of students come from these schools?

They are well educated. Many of them, in later study abroad have taken high rank. Many are filling the most exacting posts in China today.

A Chinese Christian girl

They are patriots. Not only in such tests as that of the Student Movement of 1919, but in the deeper test of continued national services at personal loss, many of these students and graduates have proven their calibre.

They are Christians. Even in the colleges, which enrol their students after the first formative years, it is almost always the case that the majority of the graduates are Christians. In the North China Conference, for example, a survey showed that out of seventy-four preachers, thirty-five were graduates of Peking University.

In government service, in commerce, in philanthropic leadership, as well as in all forms of service of an avowedly Christian character, the products of Methodist schools are contributing much to the building of a new China.

Principles of development.—The lines along which the Methodist Episcopal Church must proceed to develop its schools in China have been suggested in the words of Bishop Lewis. Not the number of schools, but quality!

It cannot be said that there are yet enough Methodist schools. In not a single territory is the Methodist Episcopal Church able to provide an elementary education even for those children of its membership not otherwise provided for. It is still necessary to increase the number of schools under Methodist auspices.

Much of the cost of this development, however, will be borne by the Chinese. The day is long past when it is necessary to pay parents in order to secure students. There is not a single school in China, so far as has been reported, but is turning away prospective students. Increasingly it has become the policy to require of any community a substantial contribution toward the building and equipment of a school and the salary of the teacher before a new school is opened.

There are also some gaps in the educational system that must be filled. Particularly must there be more adequate provision for the training of teachers, and the raising of the grade of the schools preparing preachers and other Christian workers is an immediate need, upon which the quality of our ministry depends.

Distribution of Methodist Episcopal educational institutions in China

With all this, the church does not forget that its duty is to provide models that shall commend Christian standards of education to the China that is to be. For this purpose educational experts are required, who are called upon to supervise closely the work of the schools already established and bring up all standards of work.

This constant rise in grade, extending from the lower primary school to the university, with the extension of common school privileges to all the Methodist constituency, can be said to comprise the immediate development before Methodist schools of China.

NEW CHINA'S HEALTH

The menace of disease.—Drastic effort for the betterment of the health of China's people likewise comprises one of the problems in the making of new China. While definite statistics are lacking, the ravages of disease are known to lower greatly the potential powers of the Chinese.

Cholera, plague, smallpox, dysentery, leprosy, varied forms of fever—these are the diseases that are popularly thought of in connection with China. It is true that they exist in strength, taking a high toll of life annually. But the most devastating of all ills is tuberculosis.

In the city of Shanghai, from which fairly accurate medical returns are obtainable, eleven per cent of the deaths in a single year are found to have been caused by the white plague. Twenty-five hospitals elsewhere report 24.5 per cent of their patients as tubercular, although some of these institutions do not admit pulmonary cases. Out of a hundred students selected at random from a lower school in West China, only forty-six were from families that had no immediate tubercular history.

These are but indications of the prevalence of this disease. It makes its way into all ranks of society. Many have been the ministers of the gospel who have been taken by it from their work. And it is an axiom of history that you cannot build a strong nation on weak bodies.

Preventable famines.—Again and again the West has been roused by news of famine in China. The last appeal came in 1920, when most of North China faced starvation, and the response was more generous than ever before.

It is not for China's own good, however, to go ahead depending upon foreign philanthropy to keep her children alive. Some causes of famine, such as drought extending over two years, are beyond control, and can only be dealt with by an improvement in communications that make it possible to ship food easily from one part of the country to another.

Other famines need never have been. With water in the rivers, people have starved. Others have gone hungry while huge tracts remained uncultivated. Modern irrigation and methods of dry farming can contribute much to overcoming these conditions.

Unguarded childhood.—One needs always to beware of statistics as to infant mortality in China. It has been stated that, of seven children born, not more than three live to be a year of age. There is no competent authority for such a statement, but it is probably true that, with the exception of parts of interior Africa and among some tribes of uncivilized Indians in interior South America, the death rate among infants is higher in China than anywhere else in the world.

It is grotesquely cruel to say that such a sacrifice is the only thing that keeps China from hopeless over-population. While vast stretches remain as sparsely settled as the western states of America, and methods are available wherewith to feed all this additional population, it is clear that here is a force being wasted that China needs.

The Christian contribution.—With the doctor, the nurse, the hospital, the dispensary, the traveling health exhibit, the city sanitary campaign, the agriculturalist, the forester, the orphanage, the training class for mothers, the day nursery, and with many other aids, the Christian church is coming to bear its part in conserving the health of China.

In part it does this out of devotion to the health of all peoples. A disease that gathers power in a region where there are no competent doctors may spread, as did the influenza, until it snuffs out lives all over the globe. But even the pneumonic plague, the last disease known to medical science with a mortality record of 100 per cent, was held by the devotion of medical missionaries and their associates to a narrow confine.

In part the church does this out of devotion to China. It works to bring China the abundant life that Christ has offered all men. And surely no conception of an abundant life can include hungry stomachs, diseased bodies, or dying babies.

METHODISM AND CHINA'S HEALTH

The work of the medicine kit.—In conserving the health of China the Methodist Episcopal Church is bearing a notable part. More than sixty doctors and nurses are on the field, beside the Chinese medical assistants who are indispensable for the conduct of hospital and dispensary.

In Shanhaikuan, where the Great Wall runs into the sea; in Peking; in Tientsin; in Taian, at the foot of China's sacred mountain; in Nanking; in Wuhu; in Kiu-kiang; in Nanchang; in Chungking; in Tzechow; in Futsing; in Chengtu; in Chin-kiang; in Foochow; in Kutien; in Mintsing; in Yenping; in Yungan; in Hankong, the port for Hinghwa; and in Sienyu, there are Methodist hospitals or major dispensaries. Some of these are conducted by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society; the others by the Board of Foreign Missions.

The work varies all the way from the Hopkins Memorial Hospital in Peking, with its many departments, pronounced by experts the best church hospital in North China, to rude sheds in which hundreds await devoted doctors with the salt solution that saves from the dread cholera. In some places it has been found possible to open dispensaries, staffed by Chinese trained in some central hospital, in which simple remedies are provided for regions at a distance.

For many years the medical missionary was the surest point of contact between the Chinese and the gospel. His service in that respect is still of mighty value. But he also stands as a constant proof that Christianity cannot see men anywhere in misery without desiring to help.

The gospel of the plow.—In the scientific study of new methods of agriculture, and in object lessons given by agricultural missionaries in North China and Hinghwa, the Methodist Episcopal Church is seeking to do its part in lifting the standard of living comfort in China.

The School of Agriculture and Forestry of the University of Nanking has already achieved national prominence, and the similar school to be developed in connection with Peking University will be equally valuable. Extension work and experiment stations are being started in Fukien and are projected for West China. Early missionaries brought to China many articles of today's ordinary diet, and today's missionaries are making more valuable present products of China's soil.

It is too early as yet to recount the outcome of the agricultural experiments now in process. But a school like that at Nanking, by improving the quality of the cotton raised in China and by eliminating unhealthy silk worms, has given an entirely new outlook to those two basic industries within the past five years and large future development is certain.

If the millions of Chinese dependent upon cotton growing or silk weaving find a better market for their products, and an increased output for that market, thereby bettering their condition, they have the service of such a school largely to thank.

"Cleanliness is next to godliness"—not a verse in the Bible, indeed, but always a preachment of Christian missions

The first modern cotton gin to reach China—imported by the Agricultural Department of Nanking University Practical help of this kind in solving the problems of new China is finding recognition throughout the country.

Touching child life.—When it comes to service for children the story is much too long to compress into this volume. Leaving out of account all the hospitals and all the orphanages and all the kindergartens and all the primary schools, one is tempted to linger over the story of the ministry of such an institution as the Ida Gracey Home for Crippled Children in Kiukiang or such an industrial school as has been conducted in Foochow. The temptation cannot be resisted to mention a single bit of service in one city that requires no institution whatever.

Every sunshiny day in the city of Hinghwa—and most of the days there are sunshiny—a procession makes its way into some part of the city. After screens have been set up in some safe spot beside the street mothers are invited to bring their babies for a proper bathing. At first the innovation was looked upon with suspicion. Today the mothers of Hinghwa overtax its resources. They are glad to provide the cost of the service. And the babies of that city are being cared for as they never have been in the past!

A simple act? Yes, but just one sample of the way in which Methodism is doing its part in every realm of China's life to look after the welfare of China's people. For it is all a contribution to the making of a new land.

NEW CHINA'S CULTURE

"White Language."—In his Outline of History, Mr. H. G. Wells gives more space to the written language of China than to the American Civil War. He does so, of course, because he holds that China's language has had the larger influence upon the course of humanity. Probably he is right. If ever a language was designed to withhold knowledge from the majority of men, the ancient Chinese classical form of writing, known as wen-li, was. No man could be said to have mastered its intricacies in less than twenty years of intensive study.

For years men have known that a new China, founded on a body of citizens capable of rendering informed judgments, was impossible as long as the ability to read and write was confined to ten per cent of the population. But so strong was the hold of the wen-li, hallowed by use by Confucius, Mencius, and the sages of thirty centuries, that all attempts at reform were baffled.

In 1916 a little group of enthusiasts, led by Professor Hu Suh of the National University of Peking, began to write in a form totally different from the wen-li. No one spoke wen-li. From the standpoint of speech it was as dead a language as the Latin in which Europe wrote its medieval literature. Three hundred million Chinese speak Mandarin. Why not write as these speak?

To this new form of writing was commonly given the name, pei-hua. Literally that means "white language," the suggestion being of the whiteness of the light of the sun. The new form is designed, in other words, to produce a literature that the ordinary Chinese can, in the Western phrase, "see through." Despite the fact that it employs the traditional Chinese characters, it will probably prove as possible to give the rudiments of an education in this medium in the few years spent in a primary school as in the same number of years in Western schools using the Roman alphabet.

Renaissance or revolution?—Naturally, the appearance of the pei-hua aroused the opposition of the old Chinese literati. The young reformers were accused of undermining the foundations of Chinese culture. The Chinese is, however, as reasonable a creature as lives. And when poetry, philosophy, history, fiction, and all other imaginable literary works began to come from the presses in the new form, and were found as expressive as the old, pei-hua soon won its way into general use. At the present time most of the books, practically all of the periodicals, including newspapers, and an enormous amount of miscellaneous literature in tract form, are being issued in pei-hua.

This has completely changed the cultural outlook in China in as short a time as since the Centenary was launched! Ponder that statement. It is probable that historians five centuries hence will put it down as one of the few great facts of our times. The number able to read a Chinese newspaper has been at least doubled since the world war closed! And the increase in the number of literate Chinese will, for a time, be in geometrical proportion as the number of schools and pupils increases, and the time necessary to learn to read and write decreases.

The result of flinging these doors open to millions of Chinese has been compared to Europe's Renaissance, those golden days when men's eyes were opened to new realms, and they went running out, mentally and physically, to the discovery of new worlds. But China's literary leaders refuse to be satisfied with that word. They are filling the publications that are springing up with the world's latest political, philosophical, and scientific thought, and they insist that the result will be, not a renaissance, but a revolution; an entirely new culture, not a rebirth of an old one. And why not?

What is Young China thinking?—The outward and visible sign of this inner and spiritual change in the thought-life of China is the crush of magazines to the news stands. Many of them die a-borning. Others attract large circulations, and are read throughout the country. There is scarcely a student center that does not produce its papers.

What do these new periodicals offer China? Better than any attempt to describe them is to list the table of contents of a single issue of a single magazine, picked at random from a newsstand that bore at least forty others much like it. This was a magazine issued by students in a government school. It has a large circulation. Compare its contents with those of the periodicals to be found on the newsstands of America, or better still, with the student publications of the United States. This can be taken as a fair sample of what thousands of Chinese are reading today:

The Christ Before Jesus.
The Foundations of Anarchy, and the Society of Anarchy.
Opposed to the Life of Individualism.
The Field of Psychology.
Industry in Relation to Livelihood.
Woman's Rights and the Law.
The Present Day Power of Democracy.
The Building of Public Opinion.
The Methods of Sociology.

The Christian contribution. — Is the church to stand idly by while the cultural life of new China is being formed? By no means. In fact, to the church's honor be it said that it has been experimenting in these fields for years.

It was the Mandarin version of the Bible, translated in an effort to give the Scriptures to a larger audience than could read the wen-li version, that first showed the possibility of producing real literature in the same form in which most Chinese were speaking. It has been the church's insistence upon the necessity of a literate membership that has kept this problem of an easily-mastered cultural medium to the fore. The present triumph of the pei-hua, while it rightfully belongs to Chinese writers, owes much to the pioneering of the Christian church.

Likewise, the church has a responsibility in the face of certain kinds of literature that are flooding the Chinese markets. The production and distribution of Christian literature, although vigorously promoted by Bible societies and publishing agencies, has not yet attained a scale where it can be said to touch more than the fringes of the Chinese market. On the other hand, continental scepticism in all its forms is being translated in large editions, and great numbers of questionable novels are being sold.

This moment, while this huge new group of readers is forming its habits of reading (for it must be remembered that the addition of a single per cent to the number of literate Chinese increases the total reading public by 4,000,000) is the time of all times for the church to stress the distribution of Christian literature.

Methodist literature in China.—In this effort the Methodist Episcopal Church must bear its part. For years the Methodist Publishing House has been one of the outstanding Christian agencies in this field. The Mission Book Company, a union distributing agency in which the Methodist Publishing House has a partnership, sells more than half of the total Christian literature distributed, leaving out of the account the sale of Bibles and Scripture portions.

Behind the publishing and distributing agencies is the Methodist editorial force, composed entirely of Chinese, under the direction of Dr. Lo Ren-yen. This highly efficient group produces a weekly newspaper in co-operation with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and a monthly magazine that circulates among the young Christians far beyond Methodist boundaries.

Miss Laura M. White, of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, has also gathered a woman's staff composed almost entirely of graduates of Methodist schools for girls, who, working in conjunction with the Christian Literature Society, produce a monthly that has been nicknamed "The Ladies' Home Journal of China."

In addition to periodicals, both these editorial staffs bring out a large amount of pamphlet and book literature. All of it is steadily winning recognition.

Spreading the Scriptures.—In no part of the world has the work of the Bible societies been more effective. The American Bible Society has as its agent a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Under its direction 1,987,326 Bibles and portions of Scripture were distributed during 1922, very little of it without some payment.

Some hint of the vast influence of this work may be obtained from this report, but one of many that have come in during the present year:

The American Bible Society's wheelbarrow and colporteur in China

"Last year when I visited this village and opened an outstation the Taoist priest was the first inquirer, although he was living in a temple. Later, I stayed a couple of weeks there and he often came over to see me. He read very well, so I gave him some tracts and small books. We prayed together and I started to teach him the Bible, but very soon I discovered that he understood nearly everything that I taught him. The acts of our Saviour he knew; why he came and died; and the baptismal act. So I asked if he had read the gospel before. 'Only once,' he said, 'twenty years ago.' 'How do you know so much about the gospel then?' I asked. 'Some men belonging to your doctrine from the province of Shansi went through here at that time preaching the gospel and selling books. I heard them preach and wanted to buy a small Matthew's gospel, but one of the men said that I should rather buy a New Testament. I replied that I could not afford it, but he said it did not matter; so he gave me a New Testament and I gave him eight cash. At the first I did not understand anything and I thought to throw the book away; but I kept on reading, and slowly

At first, when I did not understand so much, I worshipped a tablet on which I had written Shangti Lao Tien Ie, (Jehovah, Lord of Heaven); but now I have thrown that away and only worship Jesus.”

NEW CHINA'S SOUL

The fundamental lack.—In considering what must be provided for the making of the new China mention has been made of the stabilizing of government, the development of natural resources, the building of industrial life, the safeguarding of health, the providing of education, the forming of a new culture. In all these the Christian church has been shown to have a share, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, as an important factor in the Christian enterprise, has been shown as facing an unescapable responsibility.

But China's fundamental need, as her best sons and daughters see, is for something more intangible and at the same time more important than any of these. China needs a renewed spiritual life. Many of the fountains at which her soul has drunk are drying up. Soul-sterility confronts her as an immediate menace.

When officials can mouth moral maxims and grow rich on graft; when industry can pile up profits and squeeze out lives; when hunger and death can be regarded complacently as the due portion of the majority; when education can lead to agnosticism and materialism be exalted as a way of life, then the soul of any nation is endangered. How is this danger being met?

The menace of disintegrating faiths.—China for almost two thousand years has lived largely under the impetus of three faiths—Confucianism, Buddhism, Taoism. To be sure, Mohammedanism has been in China since the days of Mohammed himself, and has gathered several million adherents. But these live as separated groups, isolated from the life about them. It is the three named that have made China what she is.

Taoism has degenerated into a maze of incantations and superstitions that cannot much longer survive the blaze of a new day. It is passing, and that rapidly.

Buddhism, while containing elements of permanent value, and experiencing some local attempts at revival and purification, is suffering from a priesthood of low intelligence. The parasitic Buddhist priest is the butt of every tearoom jester. Popular Buddhism, under his hands, has become such an idolatrous superstition that to thinking Chinese it is repulsive.

Confucianism is coming to be recognized as a philosophy rather than a religion. Confucius was himself too agnostic ever to have given birth to a religion. As a philosophy, Confucianism will exert influence for generations to come. On the whole, it will be beneficial influence. As a religion, its limitations are perceived.

But if nothing is to take the place of these passing faiths, the world may well tremble. China, animated by an agnostic materialism, would become overnight a serious menace to world peace. For her own good, as well as for the good of all others, she must find a faith by which to live.

Can Christianity fill the breach?—As far as human wisdom can discern, China's spiritual allegiance will be settled for a hundred years within the next ten. The Washington Conference has assured China a ten-year breathing space, during which time she will decide the status with which she will face the future. Is it to be as a Christian nation?

Not if many devoted Chinese have their way. They believe that any religion is an antiquated absurdity, and that what China must have is, in the phrase of a student, "the iron-and-blood heart and spirit." They frankly favor a materialistic, militaristic state.

Nor can there be any hope of making China Christian in the sense that it is to reproduce any particular Western civilization. Bertrand Russell has written as though "Christianizing" and "Americanizing" China were the same thing. China sees too clearly how far short the West has fallen in its approximation of Christian ideals to allow that mistake.

Nor, let it be admitted, can China be made Christian in these few years in the sense that all Chinese will join Christian churches.

But this can happen: Jesus Christ can be held up before China as the saviour and captain of her soul. Enough of her leaders, now and to come, can be brought to intimacy with Christ to set afoot forces that will have vast molding powers. Examples of the power of his gospel can be multiplied. Christianity can be shown generating spiritual vitality. And this can be done before the eyes of enough Chinese to insure that, finally, all China will seek soul-strength at this source.

One of our brothers in Christ—local preacher in Chungking

This is an answer of faith, contingent, as it must be, upon a proper support for the Christian enterprise during these next years. But it is a faith that grows out of knowledge; the knowledge that Christianity, given the chance, can save China.

THE METHODIST PROGRAM IN CHINA

A solemn responsibility.—The Methodist Episcopal Church faces this crucial hour in China in a sense of solemn responsibility. It does not possess unlimited resources. Yet it knows that it must bear its full share of the task, and that without lingering.

There is no room within this book to outline the Methodist program in China in its entirety. Mention can only be made of the three main lines of strategy that are being followed.

Encouraging Chinese leaders.—The Methodist Episcopal Church had Chinese local preachers

Christianity must furnish the spiritual guides for new China

almost as soon as it had Chinese converts. From that first day, three-quarters of a century ago, the main effort has been to discover Chinese capable of bearing large responsibilities.

Today, on the fifty-one districts of China's Methodist conferences, there are forty-three Chinese district superintendents. Chinese act as heads of schools, and hold full professorial rank in colleges and universities. In the general promotional agencies, such as the Eastern Asia Jubilee, Chinese are at the head of departments, and there is a Chinese executive secretary. In the Central Conference for Eastern Asia a majority of the delegates are Chinese. On finance committees numbers of Chinese sit. Half the membership of the All-China Finance Committee is Chinese. In fact, it is impossible to touch the Methodist Episcopal Church intimately anywhere in China without finding Chinese moving into places of responsibility.

It is a commonplace of foreign missions to say that the evangelization of any country rests at last in the hands of the Christians of that country. In China the Methodist Episcopal Church gives evidence of its readiness to rely upon the Chinese members of the church to take the lead. This is not by any theoretical pronouncement, but by actually turning over responsibility as fast as the Chinese will receive it.

Erecting commanding institutions.—It is impossible to cover China immediately with all the Christian institutions that nation will eventually demand. Nor would it be wise, were it possible,

But it is wise, in this brief and critical hour, to place in conspicuous centers some institutions that will adequately represent Christianity. Because of its poverty, the Chinese church cannot do all that is thus required. To the extent of its ability, it is doing amazingly well.

The church at large is therefore called upon to plant without delay, a few great colleges, a few great hospitals, a few great churches. Well located, these must give millions of Chinese an object lesson in the scope and service of Christianity. A glance at the map of China, showing the principal centers of Methodist occupation, will show how strategically located to influence north, south, east, center, and west are the cities in which the outstanding Methodist institutions are being erected.

Occupying the field fully.—The Methodist Episcopal Church will not soon seek new territory in China to enter. In the careful delimitation of responsibility as between missions the Methodist obligation has been clearly determined.

But there is a difference between entering a field and occupying a field. If the responsibility of the Methodist Episcopal Church is for the evangelization of 40,000,000 Chinese, as is generally stated, and there are not today 500 missionaries of the Board of Foreign Missions and Woman's Foreign Missionary Society on the field, it will hardly be claimed that complete occupation has yet taken place, or that it is immediately in view.

Taking into account all possible workers, Chinese and foreigners, ordained and unordained, in educational, medical, agricultural, literary, business, and all other forms of work, as well as evangelistic, on furlough in America as well as in China, there are not more than 5,600 available.

The situation in China is too pressing to allow a drifting policy any chance of success. The church cannot put one evangelistic missionary in Chengtu and another in Chungking, ten days' journey distant, and a third in Suining, another week distant, and a fourth in Tzechow, still a week away, and then call the West China territory, where it is solely responsible for the welfare of 12,000,000 people, occupied.

During the world war there were politicians who tried to convince their nations that victory might be won by a policy of "wait and see." They were wrong, and the people knew it. In this struggle the church sometimes seems content to "wait and see" what will happen. If the field is not occupied in China without delay it is clear what will happen. The hour of our visitation will pass.

A FEW DEVELOPMENTS

As suggestive of some of the things that the Methodist Church has already done in China mention may be made of four enterprises.

The Institutional Church, Foochow.—If you take a map of the great city of Foochow, capital of the province of Fukien, and locate its geometrical center, the point of your pencil will just about fall upon the Siong Iu Dong (Central Institutional Church.) This church has not yet been able to obtain the plant it must eventually have, but, in adapted Chinese buildings, it already conducts a full program of church services, a kindergarten, schools for girls and boys, a museum, medical work, and a course of lectures that draws from all parts of the city and all grades of society.

A Chinese pastor trained in America heads a staff of twenty workers, of whom two others have studied abroad. The Chinese contribute several thousand dollars yearly to the support of the enterprise, which can be regarded as a type of the church by which it is hoped to challenge the attention of even China's teeming cities.

Hopkins Memorial Hospital, Peking.—In a quarter of the city of Peking in which medical responsibility cannot be shared with another church this hospital has, since 1875, been ministering. Started by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, it has been since 1885 under the direction of the Board of Foreign Missions.

The usual work of a mission hospital is carried on by a staff that includes six foreigners. Training is given Chinese for service as dispensary and hospital assistants. An eye clinic has attracted particular attention, for diseases of the eye are common in China. In a single year, 25,560 treatments were given in this one clinic, with 6,451 more in a special eye clinic for those desiring special service. A dental department has been developed during the Centenary period in which men are being prepared for dental service in seven other hospitals.

Even today, after decades of service, such a hospital provides a point of contact for the gospel with 24,546 people in a single year. Of these, 1,870 were gathered into regular Bible study classes. Forty-one patients joined the church.

The Hopkins Memorial Hospital is not designed to be the largest conducted in China by the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is, however, suggestive of the scope of and response to service of this kind.

Biblical School, Hinghwa. — Approximately sixty students come annually from the graduating classes of the higher primary schools of the Hinghwa Conference to take the three-year course that is to prepare them for the ministry. This makes it necessary to plan much of the course as an equivalent to general high school training. In addition to this and the special theological and Biblical studies, the student must take two years' work in Sunday school and boys' club work, and show two years of experience as a student pastor before graduation.

When it is remembered that there are only two other Christian schools of high school grade in the territory of the Hinghwa Conference, it can be seen that, with this course, the man entering the ministry is given a mental equipment that will put him in advance of most of his fellows. The membership of the Hinghwa Conference is practically composed of the graduates of this school.

The Hinghwa Biblical School is far from being the highest grade institution for the training of Methodist ministers in China. Yet it has contributed the major impulse toward the evangelization of what is now the most nearly Christianized portion of China. As the standards of general intelligence mount, so will the standards of this school. And this is true of all training schools in China.

University of Nanking.—This institution, one of the five of highest grade in which the Methodist Episcopal Church has a part, was formed in 1910 by a union of the Northern Presbyterians, Disciples, and Methodists. Two years later the Northern Baptists joined the project. By 1921 the student body of college grade had grown from fifty-six to 300; the number of foreign teachers from seventeen to thirty-four; the number of Chinese teachers from twenty to sixty-four, of whom eight had been educated abroad; and the property valuation from $125,000 to $600,000.

This university includes a College of Arts and Science, a College of Agriculture and Forestry, a Junior College, and schools giving specialized work in forms of education, business administration, and medicine. In addition, there are preparatory departments, a language school for the training of new missionaries and a hospital.

In close relation are the Ginling College for women and the Nanking Theological Seminary, both likewise union institutions.

The work of the University of Nanking in improving the cotton crop of China, in securing superior silk worms, and in promoting reforestation has gained wide recognition. Equally significant work is being done in the other schools of the same rank.

THE HOUR OF DECISION

God's great hours.—God has his own times and seasons. In his dealing with China surely this is one of them. Once before the door to a Christian China was wide open. Mr. Wells tells how the emperor of China begged the Christian West to send teachers, and how the opportunity was allowed to pass. Now the second hour of opportunity is here. But there are plenty of signs that this one, too, will not linger. The fathers prayed for generations that China's tight-barred doors might be opened. They are opened now. But to what purpose if we do not enter?

A desperate struggle.—Within China the struggle between the old and the new, the outworn and the needful, the material and the spiritual, is being desperately waged. It is a long way from settled as to how that struggle may go. Indeed, if one looks without faith, it is easy to believe that China will soon adopt a policy of iron-and-blood materialism that will make her a danger to all the world.

Christianity, and Christianity alone, has the spiritual contribution upon which China dare rely to organize her life for a peaceful and larger future. Jesus Christ is the only leader who can bring this mighty mass safely through the perils of these hours. And the Methodist Episcopal Church dare not shirk its share in the work of bringing China into touch with him.

The immediate need.—There has been no attempt here to list all the places in which the Methodist Episcopal Church must move forward. But the needs of all these, as they have been presented, have been scrutinized by a long line of investigating bodies; revised and again revised. Finally, the church has authorized as its program in China for 1925:

JAPAN

THE LEADER OF THE ORIENT

An imperial romance.—In all history there is no more romantic story than the development of Japan, within fifty years, from an isolated and (from the Western viewpoint) backward island into one of the world's great powers. From the time the doors of the island empire closed upon the traders of the sixteenth century until Commodore Perry's squadron forced them open again, Japan was apparently the most determinedly Oriental of all Oriental nations. Half a century later she has so completely occidentalized certain features of her life that she can enforce her will upon the Occident.

There have been those who have believed the extension of Western civilization exclusively a prerogative of the white peoples. It is not so many years since Mr. Kipling wrote of "The White Man's Burden." But that idea has almost passed, and Japan has been largely the cause of its passing. In the change from isolated island to imperial empire Japan has committed many of the same sort of sins that have disgraced the imperialisms of the West. But this cannot hide the reality of her achievement in fitting herself to cope with an alien civilization within a man's life time. Modern Japan is a good deal of an international miracle.

Champion of the East.—It is as the defender of the East against the encroachments of the West that many patriotic Japanese have conceived their country. There have been times when the same conception has been current in other Asiatic countries. Certain it is that, with all Japan's mistakes, her defiance of the West has brought about a changed attitude toward the East on the part of the European powers.

At the beginning of the last decade of the nineteenth century, the stage was set in the Orient for a general division among European states of the supposedly defenseless territories of the East. To some extent that division has taken place on the Asiatic mainland, but not to the extent that once seemed certain. The reason is to be found in the growth of Japan as a military power.

Tests of strength.—

In 1894-95 Japan fought China for the leadership of the Far East. The West was so little impressed by the strength shown by the Nipponese that a group of European powers, led by Russia, coolly appropriated part of the spoils of that victory. For the rest of the century, and following the Boxer uprising in China, this European advance continued. Russia led, gradually absorbing Korea, then gaining practical control of Manchuria, and making unmistakable advances toward Mongolia.

England, with her empire in India, was as much frightened by this growth of Russian power in Asia, as Japan, and agreed, in the Anglo-Japanese alliance, to hold the circle if Japan went to war. In 1905 Japan stopped the Russian advance.

It has become the custom to point out how little Japan won in her war with Russia. At least she won a place as one of the great powers, and five years later was established as a power on the Asiatic mainland.

One of the great powers.—As one of the great powers, Japan has disappointed many hopes in Asia and among the liberals of the rest of the world. It must be said, however, that Japan has never pretended to be other than an intensely centralized and conservative monarchy, and that, in the worst phases of her imperialism, she has followed models set for her by other states. There has been in Korea or Formosa no cynical disregard for right in order to gain trade or political advantages but can be paralleled in the colonial history of most, if not all of the world's

Imperial policy.—As one of the powers, Japan has set herself to strengthen her political and industrial position. To do the former she has followed the obvious militaristic models of Europe, building up an effective conscript army and a navy that ranks third among the navies of the world. The real government of the empire has been too largely in the hands of the militaristic groups. Japan would point to her present enviable position among Asiatic nations as complete justification of this course.

To strengthen her industrial position, Japan has begun to change from an agricultural to a manufacturing state, and has sought to annex or control many islands in the Pacific and parts of the Asiatic mainland which might be expected to yield raw materials. Japan is handicapped by lack of coal and iron, those fundamental requisites of a modern state, within her own boundaries. She has sought to overcome this handicap as other states have, by going out with a gun to seize such territory as might yield the precious minerals. She but follows long precedent.

It has yet to be proved that other national ideals will be necessary in order that a state may maintain leadership in the period just opening. Many have said that this will be so, but Japan is waiting for ocular proof. By her course at the Washington Conference she gives evidence that, if a change is necessary, she will adapt herself to new international conditions as readily as she did to the strange environment into which she was thrust fifty years ago.

MODERN JAPAN

From agriculture to manufacturing.—Not long after the opening of the nineteenth century England learned that, after a restricted territory contains a certain population, it can continue to support its inhabitants only by shifting from agriculture to manufacturing as a means of livelihood. A dozen can be employed in a factory producing goods to be exchanged for food to every one who can be employed on the land.

At the opening of the twentieth century Japan had to face the same condition and learn the same lesson. Her population had reached the forty-nine million mark, or approximately 295 persons to every square mile. As only seventeen per cent of the volcanic territory of Japan proper is available for cultivation (and this includes thousands of square miles of terraced hills that would be shunned in such a land as America) it was apparent that the point had been reached at which new arrangements for supporting the life of millions must be made.

The war and Japanese industry.—Colonization projects, whether in semi-tropical Formosa or colder Korea and Manchuria, did not attract more than a few hundred thousand. Japanese leaders were astute enough to see that the only solution lay in the building of a highly organized industrial state.

Soon after this decision had been reached, as factories began to rise in certain sections, the nations of Europe plunged into war and sought desperately for markets in which to buy needed supplies. Within a single year the number of factory workers in Japan mounted from 300,000 to more than 2,000,000. Wages doubled and trebled. The cost of living did the same thing. The nation was transformed from a debtor to a creditor state over night. The stock markets were jammed with speculators. Profiteers amassed enormous fortunes. Wealth seemed about to become the portion of every family.

Post-war conditions.—The inevitable reaction has come since the war. Much of the war-fostered trade was with the Russian government, and when the Tsar fell Japanese manufacturers of munitions found themselves holding tsaristic bonds of doubtful value. This explains much of Japan's interest in the Russian empire.

With the collapse of the war markets, notably in silk, as many fortunes have been lost as were made during the heydays of speculation. Unemployment is rife in Japan today. But the shift to a manufacturing basis is permanent. The volume of trade in such a port as Yokohama, for instance, has grown from $500,000 in 1860 to $353,500,000 in 1916 and $739,000,000 in 1920. While there is a depression in Japan at present just as there is in every other part of the industrial world, Japan is on an entirely different basis from that of the period when, for example, the Centenary was in formulation. Japan is now a nation of confirmed industrialism.

SOCIAL STRENGTHS AND ILLS

Added material comforts.—In the rapid changes that have come to Japan in the past half century, there have been great advances in certain aspects of Japanese life. Living is more comfortable, particularly in the cities. Wages have gone up, as in Yokohama, where a carpenter now receives from $1.65 to $2.00 a day, and a gardener $1.40 a day.

The cost of living has likewise advanced, until Japanese cities are said to be the most expensive places in the world in which to live. But the rise in wages has made for an increased purchasing power on the part of the masses.

A literate nation.—Greatest of the social advantages has been that won through the fine system of public schools whereby, in a generation, Japan has advanced from general illiteracy to one of the highest rates of literacy in the world. With this has gone an increase in political responsibility.

The Japanese are today a nation of newspaper readers, and although Japanese newspapers frequently leave something to be desired in their discussion of public affairs (as do the papers of some other countries), there is constant and open debate on such matters. The Japanese constitution was so framed as to reduce popular participation in the government to a minimum, but the agitation for universal suffrage and parliamentary control of all national affairs is constantly increasing.

Factory evils.—On the other side of this account must be drawn the picture of the social ills that already plague Japan, and will do her still greater harm in the future. The factory system, as it has grown up, has been of a peculiarly conscienceless kind, with a few exceptions.

The exploitation of labor, particularly of woman labor, has given birth to enormous discontent that now smolders beneath the surface of Japanese life, but may burst forth in social revolt at almost any time. Much quick wealth, also, has come as the result of shady business practices that have given Japanese merchandise a bad reputation abroad.

Social sins.—Japan still has government control of prostitution, and apparently little headway is being made in dealing with this social evil, although statistics on young men examined for the army show an alarming increase in the number unfit for service.

Even the newsies read in Japan

Drunkenness seems to be on the increase, and popular festivals are being increasingly demoralized by liquor.

PATRIOTIC JAPAN

Strength or weakness.—Perhaps the greatest social ill of all, although it is frequently seen only in its political implications, is the national cult of patriotism. Up to a certain point, patriotism may be a source of strength to a state. But in the conception of the Japanese ruler as above criticism, which works to protect from criticism the bureaucracy that controls the ruler, there is nothing but danger. Undergird this conception of patriotism with a constantly stimulated patriotism and the world may have to deal with an international, as well as national, danger.

The inner struggle.—The internal life of Japan presents a constant struggle. In the first fifty years of the new era this struggle was largely between two warlike clans, the Satsuma and the Choshu, for control. The clans still have their jealousies and bickerings, but today they are united in a great fight.

Modern Japan has come to power on a bureaucratic model much like that of Germany before the world war. A class of professional office-holders, largely recruited from the aristocratic clans, has controlled the country. But the very development of the country has brought about the rise of a democratic group, intent upon winning for the people at large the control of the state. Despite the never-ceasing efforts to guard against the dissemination of "dangerous thoughts," this group has increased.

Democracy or bureaucracy. — Today the bureaucracy is locked in a life-and-death struggle with democracy. Apparently, the bureaucracy is in an impregnable position. Only the spirit of these times and the devotion of the democrats are to be weighed against it. All the history of this period in Japan is to be read in the light of this inner struggle.

THE CROSS IN JAPAN

How Christianity came to Japan.—To Francis Xavier, great missionary of the sixteenth century, there came, in Malaysia, a convert who confessed to have fled from a murder committed in Japan. Under the inspiration and guidance of this convert, Xavier penetrated the island empire, and there founded one of the strongest of the Jesuit missions of that time. The center of Catholic influence was at Nagasaki, where the majority of the inhabitants were baptized.

Why Japan closed her doors.—As frequently happened with Jesuit missions, questions of political policy became of paramount importance. Those were feudal days in Japan, and the local lord of Nagasaki, the political patron of the Jesuits, proved, in the long run, unable to withstand the power of his enemies. He and his Christian followers were wiped out with hideous slaughter.

At the same time the suspicions of the Japanese were aroused by the dealing of the priests with Spanish sailors, who boasted of their intention to conquer wherever the cross was planted. As a result Christianity itself was put under an interdict.

Despite fearful persecution, however,

"O ye who tread the Narrow Way
By Tophet-flare to Judgment Day,
Be gentle when 'the heathen' pray
To Buddha at Kamakura."

the first Catholic priests to return to the vicinity of Nagasaki after Japan was again opened, in the middle of the last century, found several hundred with rosaries and crucifixes, who claimed secretly to be Christians.

The doors reopen.—Protestant missionaries pressed in on the heels of Commodore Perry, and several daring young Japanese, going to America for education, were converted and returned to take an outstanding part in the Christian advance in their native land. The Methodist Episcopal Church began its work in 1873 and was soon established in half a dozen widely separated centers.

A quick response.—The country was so eager for the influences from the West that were to reform its life that it welcomed the religion of the West as an expected part of those influences. Many missionaries were given far-reaching opportunities for service, notably Guido Verbeck, a Christian teacher from America, to whom is given the honor of being known as the father of Japan's system of state education.

For more than two decades the Protestant advance was limited only by the resources of the missions. Had the churches adopted anything like an adequate program in Japan from, say, 1875 to 1885, Japan might have been a Christian country today, and the whole outlook of the Orient changed. Timidity at that time marks one of Christianity's great failures to take advantage of a God-given opportunity.

Growing self-control.—A natural reaction followed the initial rush of the Japanese to embrace Western ways. Christianity suffered in that reaction. Finally the present Japan began to emerge, saying, "We will not reject the West. We will take the best of the West and adapt it to our needs."

The same spirit, working within the Japanese churches, brought a powerful movement toward self-control. It was felt that, in order to make a true adaptation to Japanese life, the churches must be under Japanese leadership.

The Methodists were the last of the large Protestant groups to carry this into effect. Finally, in 1907, the three leading Methodist bodies (the Canadian Methodists, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and the Methodist Episcopal Church) united to form the Japan Methodist Church. By this union, one Methodist body appeared instead of three, thus eliminating all dangers of overlapping work. Each of the missions was left to carry on its work, particularly in the realm of higher education, but the life of the churches was put under the guidance of this purely Japanese body.

JAPAN METHODISM

A growing church.—The experiment of 1907 has, in the judgment of many observers, justified itself. Although for a few years after the formation of the united church there was some confusion it was not long before the Japanese-led body found its feet, and the present rate of growth is remarkable.

In 1907 the total number of members was 12,014. In 1921 it was 28,934, a gain of 148 per cent in fourteen years! During the same period the number of Sunday schools increased from 247 to 587, the number of pupils in those schools from 21,928 to 42,902, the number of wholly self-supporting churches from 16 to 33, and the contributions from $19,115 to $155,345—or from $1.59 annually per member to $5.36!

The Centenary in Japan.—Much of this gain has come within the past two years. Inspired by reports of the Centenary in America, the Japan Methodist Church more than doubled its giving between 1920 and 1921, while it launched an evangelistic advance that is making its impression upon all Japanese Protestantism.

It is the more unfortunate that, in the face of this zeal, the Centenary has been able to carry out so few of the projects it has announced for Japan. It is, however, recognized that without the increase in funds for running expenses made possible by the Centenary, the enormous rise in living costs in Japan would have forced the closing of much of the work already established.

A democratic body.—The Japan Methodist Church is noted for the strength of the leadership it has already produced, and for the spirit of democracy within its ranks. A visitor to the last General Conference reported that the one word heard constantly in the debates was "democracy," and since the founding in 1907 the changes that have been made in government have always pointed in that direction. In all the life of Japan, members of the Methodist Church can be counted as bulwarks on the democratic side.

The missionary's task.—As the control of the established churches was handed over to the Japan Methodist Church, the foreign missionaries moved on to occupy territory then untouched. Although these new centers are also under the legal control of the indigenous body, they constitute a work the main responsibility for which rests upon the mother church.

The missionaries work in entire harmony with the Japanese leaders, and are counted a necessity at the present stage in the life of the church. Especially valuable is the contribution that they may make in suggesting to Japanese pastors varied methods by which to carry on their work.

JAPANESE CHRISTIANITY AND WORLD PEACE

The larger importance of modern missions.—In this religious situation in modern Japan is to be seen the vital part being played by Christian missions in the formation of a new world order. The Christian missionary still works for the transformation of men's lives one by one, as he always has, and as he always will. But he is also at work for the transformation of those social and political conditions that hinder the establishment of the rule of God throughout the earth. And in that work he comes to stand between mankind and numberless ills. His ministry is, like his Master's, manifold.

Strategic Japan.—It is not too much to say that the history of the rest of this century will be largely conditioned by what happens in Japan within the next few years. If the bureaucratic forces gain control, there is every indication that they will embark upon an imperialistic course upon the Asiatic mainland that will mean war upon a vast scale. Statesmen are today watching the Far East as the probable scene of the next world war, if such a war comes. Bureaucracies are essentially the same, wherever found. That in Japan is not more selfish, more brutal, more stupid than have been those in Europe. Nor is it less.

Christianity as a democratic agency.—The importance of the democratic struggle within Japan thus becomes clear. But the democratic forces are still small in size, and while they are constantly growing, a member of the Japanese Diet declared recently before the Federal Council of Churches that "the number of liberals is few, their power small, and the movement has not advanced to the stage where we can believe it has changed the politics of the nation."

It can be only by providing a compact, unbreakable central group, about which this democratic movement can rally, and by animating it with a supernatural spirit, that the defeat of the entrenched bureaucracy can be compassed. This is precisely what Christianity is doing in Japan today! Every congregation—especially every Protestant Christian congregation—is a center of democratic strength. And the fate of the democratic movement in Japan is largely bound up with the fate of Japanese Christianity!

A struggle far from won.—It would be a mistake to underestimate the seriousness of this inner struggle within Japan, by supposing that the spirit of the times makes the victory of democracy certain. Japan is only a half century from feudalism. Its spiritual ties are all with a continent that has been the immemorial home of autocracy.

With the Japan Methodist Church occupying the honorable place that it does among the Christian bodies of Japan, a main division of the democratic forces, it would be treason to the future peace of the world not to support it now to the fullest ability of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

METHODISM'S AGENCIES IN JAPAN

General occupation.—The map on page 36, shows where the Methodist Episcopal Church maintains missionaries in Japan. It is to be remembered that there are many stations of the Japan Methodist Church not indicated. It will be seen that this occupation covers most of the important centers of Japan, with the exception of those from which agreements made with other missions exclude our workers. Note, also, that the work has followed the Japanese into Chosen (Korea) where there is a district of the Japan Methodist Conference almost entirely self-supporting. This work is confined to Japanese.

An awakened church.—Foremost among the agencies must be placed the churches. Every district reporting from Japan bears witness to an astonishing display of spiritual vigor, due to Centenary stimulus. Here are a few sample reports:

Tokyo District: "The Forward Movement was a direct result of the Centenary Movement at home, and has been both spiritually and materially a great blessing to the Japan Methodist Church. Land has been purchased, buildings projected, and a general advance registered."

Tokai District (including Yokohama): "The church has taken on new life, financially and spiritually. We all hope that the stimulus thus gained may be a permanent force, for it has added greatly to the efficiency of the church."

North Kyushu District (including Nagasaki): "The church is entirely under native leadership and doing far better than it could under missionaries. The number of full members rose from 412 to 707 last year, and contributions from $9.80 to $13.71 per member."

South Kyushu District (including Kumamoto): "There is manifest improvement each year. In general faithfulness, loyalty to our faith, wisdom in meeting difficulties, devotion to the church, the Japanese Methodists are making a fine record."

Chosen Japanese District: "Nothing has done so much to arouse the Japanese Christians to their responsibility for evangelizing the people as the Centenary. Their goals and efforts to reach these goals are most praiseworthy. There has never been such activity as is now evident among Japanese Methodists."

Helping to mold the Japanese mind.—No more grave condition confronts the Christian program in Japan than that presented by the schools. It is unnecessary for the churches to maintain lower schools, because of the efficient government system of primary education. (There are a few Christian primary schools, and certain kindergartens have proved of large value.

Chapel in the Aoyama Gakuin, Tokyo

The campus and buildings

But a Christian system of primary schools is not contemplated.)

In the field of higher schools and colleges, however, the Christian forces are required. For one thing, the state does not supply facilities to accommodate more than half of the graduates of primary schools who would continue their education. For another, the atmosphere within the government high schools is not favorable to religion. The last time a census of religious affiliations was permitted in the Government University at Tokyo the students reported themselves as:

Agnostics	2,989
Atheists	1,511
Christians	60
Shintoists	9

Most of the missions at work in Japan have established schools of a higher grade to deal with this dangerous situation. The Methodist Episcopal Church has three such, in the south at Nagasaki, in the north at Hirosaki and in the center at Tokyo. The schools in the north and south are crowded to their capacity.

At Hirosaki and Nagasaki.—From the school at Hirosaki have gone many leaders of Japanese life, such as Viscount Chinda, formerly ambassador at Washington and present personal adviser to the Prince Regent, Viscount Sato, also at one time ambassador at Washington, Bishop Honda and many others. Educational conditions in that part of Japan for a time brought about the closing of this school but the urging of both government and alumni has secured its reopening.

The school at Nagasaki has always held as commanding a position as would be suggested by its site on a hill looking out over the entire city and harbor. The greatest handicap of this institution is the restricted property upon which it is necessary to fit in buildings like the pieces of a puzzle. The limit of enrolment with present facilities has long since been reached.

Aoyama Gakuin.—At Aoyama Gakuin, on the outskirts of Tokyo, the Methodist Episcopal Church has the crown of its educational system in Japan. Here, in an institution that contains academy, college and theological school, is to be found the largest enrolment, 1,589, in any mission school in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of this number, 608 are in the college, which meets the strictest requirements of the Japanese government and has full recognition. Two-thirds of the running expenses are contributed locally and one of the outstanding buildings, Katsuta Hall, is the gift of an alumnus.

It is the plan of the church to develop Aoyama Gakuin into a university, which will require a large addition to the teaching force and the physical equipment. Much of the cost of advance will be contributed in Japan. It is of interest to note that with all the plans for enlargement, the program for Aoyama Gakuin calls for only as much support from America by 1934 as is now being contributed by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to one school in Japan.

Facing the industrial situation.—To suggest some of the lines along which the Methodist Church is working in the fast growing industrial life of Japan, a visitor ought to study the vast Akunoura district of Nagasaki, where, in a strip three miles long, 12,000 workmen live while they build great steamers and battleships that fly Japanese flags.

In this district, entirely controlled by the Mitsubishi Shipbuilding Company (the largest of its kind in Japan), has been started what is to become a model institutional development. Here, with the approval of the company, the church is working among the 29,552 persons who make up this distinct community.

The territory is left entirely to the Methodists by other Christian bodies. The Mitsubishi Company supports a certain amount of welfare work but this can not be said to go below the surface of the social and moral problems presented.

A fine piece of property has already been secured, standing within a hundred yards of the Mitsubishi Technical School, within three hundred yards of the Mitsubishi Hospital, and adjoining the primary school for this district. On this property it is proposed to erect a fine institutional plant, for which $72,500 must be contributed from America.

The staff for this plant is already in view and is thoroughly trained to meet the most exacting requirements. Both as a contribution in a center of the industrial unrest that plagues Japan today, and as an example for Christian work in other parts of the empire, this Akunoura project must be carried through speedily.

Printed evangelism. — Within the last few years an unusual type of missionary work has been evolved through the insertion of advertisements bearing a Christian message in the newspapers. Since practically all Japanese are newspaper readers (see the picture on page 38), these appeals have proved of remarkable value.

The Methodist Episcopal Church participates in and makes possible the extension of this type of effort. Moreover, the Methodist Publishing House in Tokyo has become the leading Christian concern of its kind in Japan. The house shows a profit yearly, and all such profits are being used to amplify the work of this agency. At the present time when Japan is unusually open to a printed message, the value of the publishing house can be much increased.

Bible distribution.—As is natural under the conditions described, the market for the distribution of the Scriptures is constantly increasing. The American Bible Society is responsible for this work in the northern half of Japan, leaving the southern part to the agents of the British and Foreign Bible Society. By the end of 1921 the American body reported a total distribution of 4,676,258 volumes. It is stated that prison authorities in many parts of the empire now seek Testaments for the use of the prisoners.

The Need.—In view of the issues at stake, the present program of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Japan can not be considered at all adequate. For the maintenance of this work and such advance as the church has approved of during 1925 this program has been adopted:

KOREA

THE PASSING OF THE MORNING CALM

Working amid new forces.—Apostles of progress confront an entirely changed nation in Korea today. To some extent, change has come through the efforts of the Japanese. More important, however, is the change in spirit and mental attitude on the part of the 17,500,000 Koreans.

Forty years ago Korea was known as the "Land of the Morning Calm." She maintained that calm by an isolation more complete even than that of Japan. On her hundreds of miles of coast no cities or villages were allowed to rise. Even after this isolation was penetrated, the Korean maintained an inner calm that appeared to indicate complete lack of interest in the world without or in the forces that were bringing such rapid change in other parts of the Far East.

When his country was made a plaything, the Korean seemingly accepted the situation with resignation. He had no interest in learning, and the introduction of railroads, manufacturing establishments, and other marks of a material civilization moved him not at all.

Modern street scene in old Seoul

Today all this is changed. There is hardly a person in Korea who has not passed through the fire of the independence movement which has fused all groups into a self-conscious nation. Carrying on Christian work under such conditions presents a problem totally different from that which the church faced a decade ago.

Changes of a half decade.—The most casual traveler through Korea can not fail to be struck by the material advance of the last few years. Highways capable of bearing automobile traffic are being extended rapidly. The railway system will soon reach every important center. Such a city as Seoul, the capital, has been transformed into one of the most modern municipalities of the Far East.

New schools are to be seen everywhere. The government had by 1919 a total of 556 common schools (the common school in Korea is equivalent to the American grammar school), but the complete government program calls for 870 such schools.

Afforestation is carried ahead rapidly, with 150,000,000 trees planted in a single year. The value of the output of minerals has increased from $3,000,000 at the time of the annexation to $12,102,344 in 1920. Imports have increased from $33,560,000 to $140,395,000 during the same period, and exports from $10,490,000 to $109,830,000. There were in 1919 fourteen manufacturing companies with an average capital of more than $250,000. In only five of these companies, however, is Korean capital invested and only two are completely Korean in their control.

Nor has the contribution of Japan to the making of a new Korea been wholly material. Particularly in administration there has been great improvement. The old Korean government was notorious for corruption even in the Far East. Bishop Herbert Welch states that "in place of the old corrupt and exceedingly inefficient government that prevailed before the annexation, there has been established a vigorous and thoroughly honest government that has greatly improved the comfort, safety, etc., of the people and has made life and property secure."

A critical situation.—But while this advance must be recognized, it is none the less true that the situation in Korea has in its elements of great danger. The so-called independence movement of 1919, repressed so sternly by the government, has disappeared from surface view. To be sure, there is still agitation carried on by Koreans in other parts of the world. But in Korea itself, except for an occasional outbreak on the part of some irresponsible individual, opposition to Japanese rule smolders under the surface. For this reason it is the more dangerous, and the Japanese to some extent realize it.

The latest official report of the Japanese Government-General devotes several pages to an account of the way in which the favor of the Koreans has been sought. Higher posts in the government have been offered to natives. New schools are being built for them at a rapid rate. The teaching of certain subjects in Korean is permitted in these schools. Many of the worst features of police administration have been abolished. Groups of Korean officials and teachers have been taken by the government on tours of Japan, and moving pictures of Japanese life and of material improvements introduced by the Japanese have been shown throughout Korea.

Little is being left undone that the administration can think of to win the confidence of the Koreans, but it will be a long time before that confidence is won. Koreans believe that whatever is now being done for their welfare comes as a result of the aroused moral indignation of the world. Nor does the good will of the administration always make itself felt in the acts of its subordinate officers.

Missionaries and Christian workers generally are guarding themselves against interference in political matters. But while the situation in Korea is what it is and the basic doctrines of Christianity are what they are, there is always danger lest some unforeseen incident create grave difficulties.

METHODISM IN KOREA

How the land is occupied.—Korea often seems to the traveler to be just a great handful of mountains heaped up and thrown off the northeast coast of Asia. The country is about equal in area to Kansas, but has a population approximately ten times that of that state. It is a land of villages, with only a few cities of any size. Nine-tenths of the villages contain fewer than fifty homes.

The progress of Christianity in Korea has attracted the attention of the Christian world. With Protestant missions started as recently as 1885, it is claimed that there has been a new convert every made the heads of circuits, each one of which includes a good many preaching points. The church in Korea relies upon hour day and night since the work began. Today approximately three hundred thousand Koreans—one in every sixty—are reported as Christians.

The six largest Protestant denominations at work in Korea have divided the territory to prevent duplicating of effort. The accompanying map shows the way in which the territory of the Methodist Episcopal Church is scattered about central and northern Korea. More than 3,000,000 people live in these sections for whom Methodism is solely responsible. The centers of work are in the cities of Seoul, Pyeng Yang, Yeng Byen, Chemulpo, Wonju, and Kongju.

The general organization of the church is much like that of early Methodism in England and America. County seats and other important towns are volunteer service from lay preachers for much of its advance.

Marks of an apostolic church.—In many ways the church in Korea is reminiscent of that described in the Acts of the Apostles. It has a vital prayer life that is based upon an intense searching of the Scriptures. It is not at all uncommon for congregations to spend five nights a week in Bible study. Out of this has grown the practice of personal work. One observer reports: "Never a service ends in Korea without an invitation for new believers to come forward. There are few services when some do not come. I have seen as many as fifty at a regular church service. They do not come because of the sermon that was preached; they come because some other person in that congregation talked with them and talked with God about them and finally led them to the altar. This individual work has become so important that we never baptize a new believer without asking if he has led anyone to Christ. The three hundred thousand Christians in Korea were won largely in this way."

Another feature of the life of the Korean church is its benevolence. Many churches have almost reached self-support, and it is planned that practically every church now established shall reach that goal within the next ten years. One mark of the stewardship of the Korean is seen in the fact that, while the membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church, owing largely to political conditions, showed a decrease between 1916 and 1920, the contributions rose from $44,689 to $132,635. During the Centenary period more than $150,000 was subscribed by the Methodists of Korea for missionary work outside of the local church. This leads to reference to another feature, namely, the missionary zeal of the Koreans. Not only are they anxious for the conversion of their fellow countrymen, but they have formed a missionary society that is sending representatives to work among the Koreans who live in Manchuria.

It is no wonder that Sherwood Eddy once declared that, if Christianity dies out in the West, it exists in Korea in sufficient strength to re-evangelize the world.

Through the fire.—In common with that of other churches, Methodist work in Korea suffered heavily during the independence agitation. Many schools were closed, pastors imprisoned, churches burned, and hundreds of church members suffered. For a time it seemed as though the responsibility for the uprising might be placed by the authorities upon the church because the progressive character of the church members gave Korean Christians a leading part in the movement.

At present, however, the antagonism of the local government has disappeared. While the Japanese are correct in attributing to Christianity indirect responsibility for the Korean desire for freedom, they have been assured that churches and missions will to the fullest extent possible co-operate with the government in urging respect for law and aiding the efforts to bring about a mutual understanding between Koreans and Japanese. A working basis between church and state has been found.

On the other hand, while the Koreans have been disappointed in their hopes of intervention by western nations, many of them now feel that what their country most needs is internal change, so that they are flocking to the churches as they have never in the past. Missionaries report that while some of these inquirers leave when they find no political activities promoted, there remains the largest group of seekers the church in Korea has ever known.

A veteran missionary says: "The present Christian movement in Korea is the most intelligent, the most determined, the most Korea-wide movement toward the Christian church we have seen. Our churches are full and our schools are overflowing. There is an open-hearted eagerness that has never before been seen in Korea. I have talked with our own missionaries and those of other denominations and they all say that the churches have an increased attendance—it amounts in some places to as much as two hundred or three hundred per cent."

THE PRESENT IMPACT

A zealous church.—Every district report from Korea confirms this judgment. Scarcely a district but tells of congregations being held together by lay workers. In many cases it has been impossible to provide pastors. By far the majority of preachers in the Korea Conference today are laymen.

"All the work of evangelizing and soul winning is done by native agencies," writes another missionary. "The church in Korea is a virile, self-propagating church. The 'Day Collection' is a unique thing in the Korean Church. By this method men and women pledge so much of their time to direct evangelistic work without remuneration. The missionary leads and co-operates with the native leaders in special evangelistic services, in training and to some extent in actual personal work. But, aside from giving direction, inspiration and momentum, the missionary's efforts are very limited as compared to those of the native church."

The educational problem.—But, while the church in Korea is famed for its evangelistic zeal, there lies before it an educational problem that is giving its leaders much concern. Until recently the average Korean had little interest in education. The most constructive result of the independence movement, however, has been the realization that the strength of Korea in the future depends upon the proper training of her young people today.

Education is the topic of greatest concern. Anywhere a school is opened it can be filled to overflowing. Yet while this is true, as one observer reports, "the opportunity for educating boys under Christian influence is fast slipping away." It is the government that is rising to this challenge.

Reports from every district in Korea tell of Methodist schools closed or about to be closed, until it seems probable that within a few years there will be almost no Methodist common schools in the country. This is because the establishment of high grade schools by the government makes it impossible to meet the situation with poorly housed, poorly equipped, and understaffed mission schools. The alternatives are good schools or none.

Increasingly, likewise, the government will take over the field occupied by the higher common school, roughly equivalent to the American high school.

—and the result will pay

It seems tragic that in this period when, despite all the efforts of the government, not half of the boys who do apply can be accommodated, the limited resources should force withdrawal from this field and leave the moulding of the most impressionable years in the hands of an agency that is not, to say the least, aggressively favorable to Christianity.

The development of higher common schools under the impetus of the Centenary at Kongju and Pyeng Yang calls for rejoicing, but our overcrowded Pyeng Yang school reports that last year it admitted 450 boys between the ages of fourteen and twenty-two and had to turn away more than 500.

Chosen Christian College.—In union with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the Northern Presbyterians and the Canadian Presbyterians, the Methodist Episcopal Church conducts in Seoul the Chosen Christian College. Here, on a campus which, together with the present plant, is valued at $347,000, the evangelical denominations are making their bid for the commanding institution of higher learning in Korea.

The government has not yet entered this field, although it has collegiate work in prospect. The universities of Japan show what the government will be able to do. If Christian education is not to be stigmatized as second rate, it is necessary that the Chosen Christian College receive full equipment for the most progressive type of modern education. At the present time the Methodist Episcopal Church is under obligation to provide a residence for one more American faculty member, two Korean professors who are graduates of American universities, a chapel and a part of the college's necessary endowment.

Preparing a ministry.—In the Union Methodist Theological Seminary in Seoul, our church is co-operating with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to provide adequate training for the men upon whom will fall the leadership of the church in Korea. Out of the 180 Methodist ministers now at work in Korea, 100 are graduates of this school. There are at present ninety-seven students enrolled who will soon be in the active ministry. However, it will be seen that this hardly begins to meet the needs when it is known that there are 811 churches for which ministers must be supplied.

The Union Theological School now has an advanced course which is given in English for graduates of the Chosen Christian College. It trains Korean graduates of the Pierson Memorial Bible School, an institution of lower grade conducted in Seoul in connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and the Northern Presbyterian.

Training modern physicians.—In Korea, as in other Eastern lands, the need for modern physicians is so insistent that the church is giving much attention to their education. In Seoul, at the Severance Union Medical College, Northern, Southern, and Canadian Presbyterians unite with the two branches of the Methodist Episcopal Church to maintain the leading medical school in Korea. From this school 113 doctors have already graduated, while from the hospital, conducted in connection with the college, forty-two Korean nurses have gone out. The faculty at the present time includes twenty-one Americans, Canadians, and Australians; six Japanese; and eighteen Koreans. There are fifty-seven medical students in training and thirty-five studying to be nurses.

In addition to the Severance College and hospital, the Methodist Episcopal Church has in Korea medical work in Pyeng Yang, Haiju, Wonju, and Kongju.

Other evangelizing agencies. — An outstanding feature of the quickening life of the church in Korea is the improvement in methods of Sunday-school work and the growing work of such schools. Under the inspiration of trained leaders, schools are being conducted in practically every Methodist circuit in Korea. In many places separate schools are carried on for adults and for children, and ideals are high.

The Epworth League exists in some of the dist Episcopal Church has a part in the support of the Christian Literature Society of Korea which during the single year of 1921 published 47,644,244 pages of evangelical literature. This has been found to be an agency of peculiar value and must receive increasingly large financial provision.

Behind these stand fifty-one missionaries, with thirty-four additional representatives of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and two other foreign workers. The church reports 23,686 in its baptized community, of whom 19,985 are members. There are 500 Sunday schools enrolling 27,599 pupils. There are 482 churches, 125 parsonages, and twenty-one residences for missionaries.

THE NEED

There is no question that the work at present under way in Korea must be maintained. It is hardly possible that the Methodist Episcopal Church will be ready to regard this present work as its full measure of responsibility. In view of the need the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved this program for work in Korea during 1925:

Distribution of Methodist Episcopal Churches in Southeastern Asia

CENTENARY SCHOOL AT KLANG, MALAYSIA

It is beginning to dawn upon some people that whether the East shall become Christian is a matter that vitally concerns every nation and must determine the future of humanity.

SOUTHEASTERN ASIA

A SCATTERED FIELD

The busy Methodist, glancing at the map, frequently fails to realize how large is the field in which his church is working in Southeastern Asia. The Philippines, Sumatra, Borneo, Java, Banka, the Straits Settlements, the Malay States—these seem just a jumble of islands and a stub-end of a continent, an inconsiderable bit of lace-work flung across one corner of the grand design.

Yet the field that the Methodist Episcopal Church knows as Southeastern Asia, if it were transferred to the western hemisphere, would stretch from Canada on the north to Santo Domingo on the south, and would almost cover the American continent east and west.

There are about 57,500,000 people in this field. That, to be sure, is only half the population of the United States. But it represents an average density for the entire group of sixty-four persons to every square mile. The Methodist Episcopal Church is the only American mission (save a few workers of the Seventh Day Adventists and similar bodies) in all this region, except in the Philippines. In the Philippines the membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church is almost equal to that of all the other Protestant bodies.

The work in Malaysia was begun in 1885 by William F. Oldham, now bishop in South America. There is now an annual conference including the work on the Malay Peninsula, and a mission conference covering the Netherlands Indies. The episcopal residence is at Singapore.

James M. Thoburn, later bishop in India, carried the Methodist Episcopal Church into the Philippines in 1899. There is an annual conference now, and a church with 60,000 members. The episcopal residence is at Manila.

FEATURES OF THE WORK

No such unity of problem can be found in Southeastern Asia as exists in other grand divisions of the church's foreign field.

In the Philippines, the work is almost wholly evangelistic. Favorable conditions created by the American occupation enable the church to center its attention upon the development of a self-reliant, self-propagating Christian community. In a remarkable degree this aim is being realized.

In Malaysia, the work has, up to this time, been largely among Chinese. Shifting by the thousands from South China to the Straits, where many of them win wealth, these merchants have proven appreciative of an educational approach. As a result, strong Chinese congregations have been founded, and some of the most successful mission schools in the world filled with children who have come largely from Chinese homes. This work, with the help of the government or with the liberal support of the Chinese, has been largely self-supporting.

In the Dutch East Indies, and in Malaysia as well, the church now realizes its responsibility to the millions of unevangelized Malays. This work is just beginning, with the training of native preachers and with the provision of various proved modes of approach. It can confidently be stated, however, that the strategy of advance in the Malay archipelago will emphasize this evangelistic work among Malays from this time forward.

THE IMMEDIATE NEED

Because of this diversity in task it is impossible to carry through any programs that apply to Southeastern Asia as a whole. There are some special workers in these fields, such as the Rev. Archie L. Ryan, who is directing Sunday-school advance in the Philippines, and Mr. E. H. Rue, who devotes some of his time to special Epworth League work in Malaysia.

There is, however, no special program for Southeastern Asia as a unit, as distinguished from its parts. The program as approved for 1925 will be found under each geographical division. To avoid too great detail these divisions have been presented as the Philippine Islands, Malaysia, and the Dutch East Indies.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

AN EXPERIMENT LONG AWAITED

In a sympathetic atmosphere.—When the United States took over the Philippines, the evangelical church awoke to the realization that here for the first time missionary work might be projected in a non-Christian land under favorable political and social conditions.

The public schools that were established throughout the islands were such as have evolved in Protestant countries. Missionaries were assured of intelligent understanding of their work on the part of officials. And while there were thousands of followers of other faiths in the islands, there were likewise great numbers who had been in touch with Christianity as at least nominal members of the Roman Catholic Church.

What the result has been.—The remarkable results achieved in the less than a quarter of a century since Protestant work was begun have shown that, given such favorable conditions, the church will go forward rapidly.

Of all the Protestant bodies the Methodist Episcopal Church has gathered by far the largest membership. There are more than 63,000 names on its rolls, or more than three times as many members

Full membership has grown more rapidly in the Philippines than in Korea, where the record has been phenomenal as in Korea, which has about twice the population, much greater compactness, a longer period of Protestant effort, and where the results achieved by our missions have been considered remarkable. In addition, the church in the Philippines is more nearly self-supporting than in any other part of Asia.

THE PHILIPPINES TODAY

Social advances.—The United States can point with pride to the results of its twenty years of administration in the Philippines. More rapidly than in any other large colony in the world the people, who had lived under a despotism for centuries, have been brought to local and insular self government.

A modern educational system has been planted throughout the islands. An effective bureau of health has segregated leprosy and driven out cholera, bubonic plague, and smallpox. Public roads have been built in all parts of the islands. Concrete bridges span the most important streams. Artesian wells provide a pure water supply. Railroad mileage has increased from one hundred to five hundred miles.

Wages have gone up rapidly. There are no economic conditions in the Philippines that make it necessary for men to do the labor of animals, as they do in China and Japan when they haul rickshas or carry sedan chairs.

Most of the trades in a city like Manila are well organized, and the strike is as powerful a weapon as in Europe and America.

Social problems.—To be sure, vice has entered as well as material advancement. Intemperance, gambling, and other social evils are strong. But over against these may be placed the active campaigns, frequently led by Filipinos, for the abolition of these conditions. Throughout the Philippines there is today an enormous public demand for education which holds out promise of vastly improved social and economic conditions in the future.

Self-government and independence.—At present practically all local government, as well as that of the provinces, is in the hands of Filipinos. Under the Jones law the only officials now appointed by the President of the United States are the Governor-general, the Vice Governor (who is also the Secretary of the Department of Public Instruction), the Auditor, and the Deputy Auditor. All members of the senate and the house of representatives are Filipinos.

Methodist Episcopal centers in Luzon

There are thirty-eight Filipino provincial governors, of whom thirty-three are elected by popular vote. Although it cannot be said that these officials have made a perfect record as administrators, yet in view of the short period during which they have been out from under the domination of a foreign power their record must be regarded as commendable.

Constant agitation is going on in favor of complete independence. While many friends of the Filipinos do not believe that the time has arrived when the islands should be cut entirely loose from the guidance and protection of the United States, it cannot be doubted but that independence will be achieved before many years shall have passed.

HOW THE CHURCH HAS GROWN

A field for the evangelist.—Protestant missionaries pushed into the Philippines immediately after the raising of the American flag. They found the missionary task simplified by the fact that, first, centuries of Catholic effort had familiarized most of the Filipinos with Christian terms and, second, the government had determined to set up a public school system.

With the government opening schools everywhere and bringing teachers by the shipload, it was unnecessary for the missions to begin educational work. This left the field open to the evangelist. The emphasis from the beginning has been upon evangelism and the results have already been seen.

All advance plans now call for an increase in evangelistic effort. The Philippines provide probably the largest field for a single type of approach in the world.

Self-support and self-propagation.—If any one thing has marked the church in the Philippines from its birth, it has been the support of the work by the native congregations. According to the policies first adopted and still adhered to, funds have not been provided, except in the cases of a few city institutions, for the erection of churches.

Congregations have been encouraged to build such churches as they could themselves afford. This has meant that most of the Methodist congregations in the Philippines have begun their worship in shacks built of bamboo with thatched roofs. After they have gathered strength, they have graduated into wooden chapels with corrugated iron roofs. From this the next step has been to concrete churches, proof against the ravages of the climate. Many a Methodist congregation is now in the third edifice it has occupied since its organization less than twenty years ago. (See the three illustrations on this and the preceding page.)

Such devotion as has made possible this sort of self-support has also led to a rapid spreading of the church through the Filipino effort. At the present time, for example, in addition to the forty-nine members of the annual conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church and forty-six local preachers, there are 1,117 unordained Filipino pastors and exhorters, offering a lay force for evangelistic advance.

The prevention of overlapping. — In 1902 an Evangelical Union was organized by the missions of the Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian, Congregational, United Brethren, and Disciples churches. In order to prevent duplication of effort, the territory was divided up between these agencies.

The Methodist Episcopal Church accepted responsibility for the evangelism of all that part of the island of Luzon, the principal member of the Philippine group, lying north of a line drawn east and west through the City of Manila. While there are a few bodies at work that have not recognized the decisions of the Evangelical Union, it can be said that there is practically no overlapping in the Protestant work in the Philippine Islands.

Centers of Methodist occupation.—There are eight districts in the Philippine Islands Conference. Manila, the capital, contains ten congregations and several institutions, such as the Union Theological Seminary, the Methodist Publishing House, and the hostel for the Methodist students.

Methodism also occupies Vigan, with hostels for students for both sexes; Cabanatuan; San Fernando, also the seat of student hostels and a Bible Training school; Paniqui; Malolos, Tuguegarao, where there are hostels for boys and girls; and Aparri, where there is a dispensary. In addition to these cities there are hundreds of towns occupied, with 241 churches already built and about the same number of congregations which have as yet no buildings. The development of railroads and motor roads is rapidly bringing all parts of the work within twenty-four hours of Manila.

The Methodist Publishing House distributes literature in ten dialects and is one of the most valuable evangelistic agencies in the islands.

The Union Theological Seminary has raised its standards so that it now admits only graduates of accredited high schools as regular students. In co-operation with the Presbyterians, the United Brethren, the Congregationalists and the Disciples, the Methodists are here preparing a high type of leadership for Protestant advance.

By establishing hostels in educational centers, we give students from Christian homes decent living conditions and by such a constructive ministry hold them within the influence of the church.

All observers report that the necessary preparation has been made and sufficient momentum accumulated to carry the church in the Philippines on to a great advance movement in the next few years.

PROPOSALS FOR THE FUTURE

The building of churches.—While the church has been going forward rapidly in the Philippines, it has not yet entered large stretches of territory that have been voted its peculiar responsibility. In Zambales province, for example, there is a stretch of almost 100 miles of coast where 84,000 people live without preacher, priest, or other religious worker. Indeed, in the province of Rizal, surrounding the city of Manila, not more than one-third of the territory has been occupied. Moreover, almost half of the congregations already formed are still without permanent homes and many of the churches already built are of the flimsiest character.

The contribution of the Philippine church toward the support of its pastors has grown from $9,657 in 1916, when there were 49,000 church members to $53,754 in 1922, with 63,000 church members. The value of buildings owned by the church has increased during the same period from $29,461 to $818,610. The number of congregations and the number of church edifices must immediately be increased.

It is not, however, the policy of the church to call upon the Methodists of America to contribute any large part of this advance. In certain city projects, such as would require missionary support in America, some assistance will be sought from outside sources. In most cases the entire cost of new church buildings will fall upon Filipinos.

Safeguarding the students.—While the policy of the government lifts from the Christian forces the necessity for providing education, save for specialized forms of church service, there remains a responsibility toward the moral welfare of the students in the government schools. Hundreds of these come from a distance to the centers in which high schools have been located. Here students of both sexes are frequently forced to live under dangerous conditions. Many sons and daughters of Christian families drift away from their religious moorings, while others fall into vicious ways.

The erection of hostels has proved the only satisfactory method of dealing with this condition. These are practically self-supporting and are under careful supervision. In order to hold the coming generation several of the hostels already overcrowded must be enlarged and still others must be planted in strategic educational centers.

A hospital in Manila.—The Methodist Episcopal Church feels that the time has come when it must provide medical service in some central point for its members. For this reason there is proposed the erection of a hospital in Manila. Practically all the other Protestant bodies now at work in the Philippines have an extensive medical program.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church has a hospital for women and children. There are not enough facilities, however, to provide for all who seek its aid.

The Methodists have for years been imposing upon the charity of the other bodies, but the time has come when all these have more cases for which they are directly responsible than they can accommodate. It is believed that a hospital erected in Manila will be self-supporting both as regards expenses and maintenance of staff.

Other forms of work.—Within the last few years the development of Sunday schools has come to the forefront of the Protestant program. There are now more than 38,000 members in the Sunday schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Provision for the adequate training of executives and teachers as well as for the opening of large numbers of new schools must be made. It is probable that no item in the program for the Philippine Islands means more to the future of the church than the budget for Sunday-school expansion.

Within the last few years there has been a remarkable advance in Epworth League work, which it is proposed to encourage by the use of training institutes and specially prepared literature.

Particular attention is to be given to the development of the Methodist Publishing House. By additions to the present plant not only can its use be increased but much of the cost of the literature program can be defrayed from additional rentals. The value of this form of propaganda is widely acknowledged and with the great increase in the available reading public as well as the growing interest in education, there is now a chance to bring the evangelical message to the attention of thousands who were almost entirely beyond reach a few years ago.

MALAYSIA

(Straits Settlements, Federated Malay States, Unfederated Malay States, Sarawak)

SINGAPORE—AN ORIENTAL MELTING POT

A city with seventy languages.—At the southeastern tip of Asia lies one of the world's most cosmopolitan cities. Singapore in a way is the Ellis Island of the Orient. Of its total population of 425,000 nearly seventy per cent were born elsewhere. More than 300,000 are Chinese, and of these seventy-five per cent are immigrants. Seventy languages may be heard on Singapore's streets and the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church is carried on in eight tongues.

The population of Singapore shifts more than that of any other city in the world. In 1921, for example, 95,220 immigrants entered British Malaysia from India and 126,077 from China, while 55,481 Indians and 68,383 Chinese left.

Singapore has been for some time the third port in Asia and the seventh in the world. During the last few years, however, the decline in the tin and rubber industries, upon which the commercial life of Malaysia has largely depended, has lowered the prosperity of the city. Conditions are beginning to improve, but Singapore is still dotted with unoccupied houses and many inhabitants are scarcely able to earn a living wage.

A center of Chinese influence.—Until the break in the rubber and tin markets, 250,000 Chinese were entering the Straits Settlements from the southern provinces of China every year. They came as fortune hunters, and what they sought they found. As a result, the population of Singapore is predominantly Chinese and business enterprises largely in Chinese hands. Many Chinese, have, after making their fortunes in the Straits, returned to the land of their birth. Others are content to remain under British government, although there is an increasing agitation among them for some share in its responsibilities.

The educational work of Methodist missions in Singapore has appealed to the Chinese of the merchant class, who have been ready to give financial support. At the same time, the greatest response to the evangelistic work has come from this group. Many Chinese immigrants have been in contact with Christianity in Canton, Hinghwa, or Foochow before leaving China. Others have taken Christianity from Malay-

Reaching a permanent population.—The collapse of industry in the Straits has at least made clear the presence of a permanent population. Those whose roots had not gone deeply into the life of the city left under the economic stress, but a large group remained and it is among these that the work of the church is being concentrated.

An evidence of the emergence of this permanent population is to be found in the increasing number of women among the non-native population. In the decade between 1911 and 1921, while the increase in male population was 2,920, the increase in female population was 5,470. Among the Chinese, of whom it used to be said that no respectable Chinese woman had ever come to Malaysia, there number now 470 females to every 1,000 males.

Workers in Singapore formerly complained that there remained little to show

for their efforts over a period of years because they were generally preaching to a procession. Statistics of the church in that city now show that permanent increase has begun in every department of church membership during the last three years.

Oldham Hall.—For years the Anglo-Chinese School for boys (more familiarly known as Oldham Hall) conducted by the Methodist Mission in Singapore, has been one of the outstanding educational institutions of the Far East. Founded by Bishop William F. Oldham during his early days as a missionary, the school has provided education up to college grade for thousands of boys who are now the Chinese leaders of Malaysia.

In this school are primary, lower elementary, higher elementary, commercial, and college preparatory departments with, at the last report, about 1,800 students. The teaching is done in English. Similar schools have been located in other centers of Malaysia and all have won the same recognition.

Sanctified printing presses.—No institution ever planted by the Methodist Episcopal Church in another land has done a more distinctive work than has the Methodist Publishing House in Singapore. This plant, which is self-supporting, and has a fine equipment, has issued thousands of pages of Christian literature in Chinese, Malay Arabic, Tamil, and English.

Today the Methodist Publishing House is recognized as the leading publishing concern, whether religious or secular, of Malaysia. Its influence as an evangelistic agency cannot be estimated.

The future in Singapore.—The Methodist Episcopal Church is the only American body maintaining a mission in the Straits Settlements. The emphasis in the past has been mainly upon educational work. By a system of government grants, the work has been maintained at small cost to the mission.

Schools for girls, conducted by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, have won as distinctive a place as those for boys. In Singapore, for example, the Methodist Girls' School is overtaxed, many of its pupils coming from the wealthiest homes in the city.

At some time in the future the Methodist Episcopal Church expects to extend its educational system so that a full collegiate course may be offered the graduates of its present schools in Malaysia. Care is being taken in the preparation for this advance, so that the enterprise will not be launched until its pedagogical as well as its financial strength is assured. In the planning for this development the Chinese community in Singapore is taking a deep interest.

All present educational work is to be continued at high efficiency. The time has come, however, for stressing of the evangelistic side of the work. To this end two or three outstanding projects must be carried through.

Fairfield Girls' School, Singapore—
a W. F. M. S. institution

The first of these is the Telok Ayre institutional church, where a modern plant is required in place of the present 20x30 foot bake-oven in which congregations swelter under the vertical rays of the equatorial sun. The site provided lies in the heart of Singapore, where an institutional program will at once appeal to the Chinese and grapple with many of the peculiar problems of the city.

The second large enterprise is the provision of a proper church for the Straits-born or baba congregation. This group, which will in large measure supply the backbone for the future church of Singapore, has itself paid more than $10,000 into a building fund. A choice site has been secured and with a little help from America a proper edifice can be erected.

The growth of a flourishing church in Singapore is almost entirely conditioned by the provision of proper quarters for the work and by the preparation of native leaders. In large part the church has in the past relied upon ministers from other countries. The Jean Hamilton Theological Seminary has, however, been reorganized and will provide a thorough training for local candidates for the ministry. By giving this school necessary equipment and faculty the foundations of a permanent church should be guaranteed.

New Doors of Opportunity

Going forward in Penang.—The second city in importance in the Straits Settlements is Penang, lying on the island of that name at the northern end of the Straits of Malacca. Here under circumstances very similar to those in Singapore, a strong school has been developed enrolling 1,500 students, with several outstation schools bringing the total enrolment to about 2,000.

At present, however, the evangelistic opportunity is commanding. Among Chinese and Indians (Tamils), large congregations that can not be accommodated in present quarters have been gathered. Local support is increasing rapidly, even in the face of unfavorable economic conditions.

With proper equipment it should be possible to maintain the present position of the Anglo-Chinese School. It is the only Protestant school in this settlement doing secondary work. The schools of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society occupy a similar position in the education of girls. Likewise, a large increase in the Christian community is in sight as soon as suitable quarters can be provided. As in Singapore, increasing emphasis is to be put upon evangelistic work in Penang.

Advance in Malacca.—Nothing more remarkable has occurred in Southeastern Asia in the period since the Centenary was launched than the opening up of Malacca to the gospel message. Here in the oldest colony on the Malay Peninsula, where for years missionary work has brought little response, there has suddenly come a growth in interest leading to the founding of a large number of churches.

Since 1921, the work in Malacca has advanced from two preachers and three churches to eight preachers and ten churches, while the amount raised for self-support has increased four times. The mission is besieged by deputations from various centers pleading for the opening of new churches. Business conditions have been no better in Malacca than elsewhere in Malaysia, yet congregations are showing a devotion that provides support for the church even when they themselves are almost without support. One of the largest evangelistic opportunities in Methodist missionary history seems to lie here.

A remarkable feature of the developing church and school in Malacca is the unusual amount of interest among Malays. Although these are Mohammedans, many are progressive. They are eager to place their children in Methodist schools and there is every promise that a large number will ultimately find their way into the Christian community.

At present the bulk of the church membership, which is increasing so rapidly, is found among the Chinese and Indians. By placing the educational work upon a permanent basis, we shall do much to conserve the results of this rapid expansion. Surely when whole villages petition for gospel attention, and the Methodists with the exception of Roman Catholics and Anglicans are solely responsible, we shall not turn away.

Progress in Sarawak.—Although not in the Straits Settlements, reference must be made to the success of the Christian community developed under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Sibu in Sarawak, the independent state in North Borneo ruled by a British rajah.

Here, since 1902, surrounded by dyak head hunters and other perils of the jungle, a colony of Chinese Christians has been seeking by the cultivation of rubber to attain independence. So far they have been successful. Despite a period in which the community faced actual starvation, it has come through triumphantly. Its church development is going ahead asking almost nothing from America for support.

IN THE MALAY STATES

Intensification.—Between Siam on the north and Singapore on the south lie nine Malay States. Four of these are included in a formal federation, the Federated Malay States. The other five seem likely to enter this agreement within a short time. All are under British control, exercised generally through Residents who act as the power behind the native sultans.

The centers of Methodist occupation are in the cities of Kuala Lumpur, the capital of the Federated Malay States, Ipoh, Sitiawan, Taiping, Seremban, Kampar, Klang. From these cities, schools and congregations radiate out through the territory.

The occupation of this field may be said to be fairly complete. Churches already established have reached a high degree of self-support, despite the recent slump in the tin and rubber markets. Future emphasis will be placed under the full development of the centers already entered rather than on extension of the work.

As in the Straits Settlements, the most successful work at the present time is that among the Chinese, of whom there are almost as many as there are native Malays. The response on the part of the Tamils has also been marked. There has as yet been little impression made upon the Malay population, which is Mohammedan, but perfect freedom for work is guaranteed not only by the progressive Mohammedan sultans but also by the British administration.

Methodist work, as in other parts of Malaysia, has been chiefly noted for its success in education. The high reputation won by the schools throughout the Malay States must be maintained. It is however, the purpose of the mission in the future to place first emphasis upon the evangelistic enterprise.

An opening state.—At the southern tip of the Malay Peninsula lies the native state of Johore. For a good many years, the sultan has been petitioning for the opening of Methodist educational work in his realm but it has been impossible to make this advance. At the present time, however, mainly on account of the remarkable growth of interest among the Malays in Malacca, one congregation has been actually formed in Johore on native initiative. Others will follow as soon as any encouragement is given. For the present, therefore, the one piece of expansion before Methodism in the Malay Peninsula is the proper occupation of Johore.

THE CALL IN MALAYSIA

The immediate need.—The Methodist Episcopal Church is carrying forward a conservative program in Malaysia, which includes, during 1925, these features:

DUTCH EAST INDIES

(Java, Dutch Borneo, Banka, Sumatra)

AN ISLAND EMPIRE

What do we know about the Netherlands Indies?—Where are the Dutch East Indies? What are they? Are they of any importance?

The answer of the average American to these questions would probably reveal a large ignorance. To be sure, he has heard of Java. That's the place coffee comes from. No? Well, it used to, anyway. And Borneo. That's the home of the wild men. Not now? Well, Borneo will always mean wild men to him. What is there about the Dutch East Indies worth knowing?

The Dutch East Indies look like this when placed on the United States

Mineralogists know that a large part of the world's supply of tin comes from the little islands of Banka and Billiton. Tobacco dealers know the Sumatra leaf. Biologists know the pithecanthropus, and now Mr. H. G. Wells is making a lot of people beside scientists acquainted with their kinsmen who walked about Java half a million years ago.

A comparative map will show that, in size, this archipelago, is wider from east to west than the United States, and longer from north to south than the distance from the Canadian border to the Gulf of Mexico. Comparative statistics will show that it has a population almost equal to half that of the continental United States, while the total land area is less than five times that of California. Eight hundred thousand of the people are Chinese.

Life in the Dutch Indies.—The Dutch Indies are like all countries on the equator, only more so. It is always hot and always wet. Sometimes, however, it is hotter and sometimes wetter.

To adapt himself to this climate the native Malay has perforce become a leisurely sort of person. Hence he has proved a poor competitor for the immigrant Chinese, who has largely taken away from him the business of the archipelago. But this business is still of restricted scope, for there are few cities. The overwhelming majority of the forty million inhabitants live rural lives.

Most of the native inhabitants of these islands are Moslems—those fierce Malays who, as pirates, left a name for ferocity in the world's literature. Interior tribes still practice crude forms of animism. But the rule of the Dutch government insures a hearing everywhere for the Christian message.

Where Protestantism has flourished.—The first white men to reach the East Indies in that search for spices that brought Columbus to the New World were Portuguese. With them went their friars, and Catholic missionary work, such as it was, brought thousands into the church's fold.

When the Portuguese passed the Dutch followed. Fresh from their fight for liberty in Europe, the Dutch proved as intolerant as their predecessors. Protestantism became the only form of recognized religion, supported by the state, and still subsidized by the government. There is now a strong movement afoot, supported by the government, to separate state and church.

In point of numbers, there have been more accessions to the Protestant churches in the Netherlands Indies than in any other non-Christian field, taking into consideration the total population involved. The state church contains the largest unified body of Protestant members to be found in any non-Christian land. Altogether there are about 735,000 Protestant church members in this group of islands.

METHODISM'S OPPORTUNITY

Where the church is established.—Although not large numerically, when compared with some of the Dutch and German bodies, the Methodist Episcopal Church occupies a significant place in the Christian enterprise in the Dutch Indies.

In the first place, it is an American mission, and is therefore not identified in the Malay mind with the ruling power. It is the only American mission, save the Seventh Day Adventist, and that plays no large part.

In the second place, the Methodist Episcopal Church occupies many centers of population, particularly on the Island of Java, although there is no overlapping with the work of the other societies. It is peculiar that the four largest Protestant communities, containing more than two-thirds of the total, are in out-of-the-way sections or on very small islands. The Christian people of Java form only one-tenth of one per cent of the entire population.

A glance at the map on page 71 will show the present centers of Methodist occupation.

Work among the Chinese.—Of peculiar importance, up to this time, has been the work conducted by the Methodist Episcopal Church among the Chinese in the Dutch East Indies.

The Chinese is the business man of the Malay Archipelago. Sometimes he has had touch with Christianity before leaving South China. Always he seems open to its approach. After he has made a fortune—and he frequently does—he desires the best education possible for his children, and that education he holds to be of the type offered by Christian teachers.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has been almost alone in approaching the Chinese of the Netherlands Indies. As a result, the congregations gathered have been largely Chinese; the enrolment in the schools has been largely Chinese; and a large share of the financial support has been carried by these Chinese.

As this group is bound to have so important a part in the future of Java and its sister islands, the development of this work among the Chinese, until they are thoroughly evangelized, must be carried on.

At present the work can not be said to have more than started, although the start has been auspicious. There are thirteen churches, with 1,153 members; eighteen Sunday schools with 1,474 members; and twenty-four day schools, with 1,665 pupils.

Approaching the Moslems.—The great field in the Dutch East Indies is the conversion of the Malays. More than in any other part of Islam these have shown themselves open to the gospel. The Methodist Episcopal Church cannot escape its responsibility in this field.

The approach to the Malays is to be two-fold. There is to be a highly developed medical work, which has proved the most effective means of winning confidence. Malay preachers are to be trained who can carry the truth to their own people.

Neither of these lines of advance has progressed beyond a beginning. The training school for preachers, located in Batavia, has gathered a promising group of students who are being prepared by well-equipped missionaries. There has not yet been time, however, to register evangelistic results.

HOSPITAL

Assistance has been promised by the Dutch government for the founding of a system of nine hospitals which is eventually to cover the field of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The government has offered to provide a large part of the cost of erection of the necessary buildings and grant a small annual subsidy. At present, however, the government is financially embarrassed, due to the condition of the tin and rubber trade.

Only one of the projected hospitals, that at Tjisaroea, has been put into commission. This, however, has more than proved the wisdom of the whole plan.

In North Sumatra.—Since 1906 the Methodist Episcopal Church has been at work in the northern part of Sumatra. Some of the results have been remarkable. During the Centenary period the work was extended to the country of the Batak—an animistic tribe in the interior that killed and ate the first American missionaries to reach them, and steadfastly withstood all advances for years.

Schools are crowded in this region, and the medical approach is winning results. The most recent report shows the church membership increasing by thirty-four per cent annually, with a constant rise, in the face of unfavorable business conditions, in self-support. The large Centenary church at Medan had about a fourth of its cost given by converts. Since 1920 the contributions of the church in North Sumatra have increased by twenty-three per cent.

The immediate need.—In the Netherlands Indies the Methodist Episcopal Church finds itself almost solely responsible for the evangelization of the commercial leaders, who have already responded, and for millions of Moslems, who are more open to Christian effort than anywhere else in the world. The program that has therefore been approved for 1925 repre-

Distribution of Methodist Episcopal churches in India and Burma

MASS MOVEMENT CONGREGATION IN INDIA

When India does clearly and openly touch the Christ and acknowledge the healing, let the world listen, for never did the Christ move amid a people more gifted with a capacity for spiritual things.

E. STANLEY JONES.

SOUTHERN ASIA

The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church is spread more widely throughout Southern Asia than any other of its major mission divisions. In the eight annual conferences and two mission conferences in India and Burma, more than 9,000 Christian workers care for a Methodist community of more than 400,000 baptized converts.

Some sense of the extent of Methodist occupation in Southern Asia can be obtained from the list of district headquarters, which includes: Bangalore, Belgaum, Bidar, Gulbarga, Hyderabad, Madras, Raichur, Vikarabad, Yellandu, Ahmedabad, Baroda, Bombay, Godhra, Kathiawar, Poona, Sind, Balaghat, Basim, Jubbulpore, Khandwa, Nagpur, Raipur, Sironcha, Asansol, Calcutta, Pakaur, Allahabad, Arrah, Ballia, Cawnpore, Gonda, Lucknow, Rae-Bareilly, Tirhut, Bareilly, Bijnor, Budaun, Chandausi, Garhwal, Nardoi, Kumaun, Moradabad, Sitapur, Ajmer, Aligarh, Batala, Bikanir, Bulandshahr, Delhi, Hissar, Lahore, Meerut, Muttra, Roorkee, Rangoon, Pegu, Syriam, Thandaung, and Thongwa.

Episcopal residences are located at Bangalore, Bombay, Calcutta, and Lucknow.

Problems common to all Southern Asia are considered quadrennially in the Southern Asia Central Conference.

The church throughout this entire region is growing at an unprecedented rate, both in membership and in self-support.

INDIA

A LAND IN FERMENT

India holds a larger share of international attention today than at any time since the Mutiny of 1857. Her people are struggling with more new ideas than at any time since the Moslem invasions began more than a thousand years ago.

Given 318,000,000 people, with elements of Dravidian, Aryan, Hun, Turk, and Mongol blood; make them speak at least fifteen major languages with more than two hundred dialects; crowd them into an area only half the size of Brazil; inoculate them with new ideas, and the resulting ferment is inevitable.

India grapples with the problems of democracy and self-determination in government; and she seeks reconstruction in her economic, social, and religious life. In her long past there have been many periods of remarkable development, when she has made great contributions to the world in art, literature, philosophy, and religion. But there has never been a day of more meaning, both for India and the rest of the world, than this.

THE HOME OF RELIGIONS

The faiths of India.—India is a land of religions. Her people are known above all others for their mystical character. This is one of the reasons for the world's undying interest in that land.

Jainism, Buddhism, Hinduism, Sikhism are native to India; while Mohammedanism and Zoroastrianism have made their home there. Today Christianity is in India, trying to make a supreme contribution to the reconstruction of all Indian life.

The minor religions, those of the Jains, the Sikhs, and the Parsees, while of interest, are not of great importance to us in this study. Buddhism has ceased to be a religion of any proportions in the land of its birth. Christianity, in its larger program, has to do particularly with Mohammedanism and Hinduism.

Mohammedanism.—There are about 70,000,000 Moslems in India today. They constitute nearly one-fifth of the population, and, as a body, are more numerous than the inhabitants of any strictly Mohammedan country in the world. They comprise a compact, aggressive group, at present justly aroused over the question of the future of the Turkish empire and the Khilafat.

For the first time in Indian history the Mohammedans are making common cause with the Hindus, particularly in regard to this question of the spiritual leadership of Islam. They are also deeply interested in the movement for a great Moslem federation embracing all western and southern Asia and the adjoining regions.

One fact that makes for the increasing number and influence of Mohammedanism in India is that they are not hampered by caste distinctions. They mingle with all classes. Their religion is characterized by an aggressive spirit. They are eager to enlist converts. Islam in India is more vigorous today than at any time since the great Moguls.

Chart of relative number of adherents to each of India's religions

Hinduism.—Hinduism is the general, indefinite term which attempts to denote the religion of the mass of India's millions. There is no more difficult word to define than Hinduism. Professor Soper says: "Almost anything can be said of it with the assurance that it is true, and at the same time almost anything which is said may be denied and that with good reason...What is it, then, which makes a man a Hindu?...The only correct answer is that it is neither belief nor yet the acceptance of a moral code which makes a man an acceptable Hindu. He may believe what he likes...and yet have no question raised as to his standing as a Hindu...To be a Hindu means to belong to one of the castes and obey the caste regulations." (The Religions of Mankind, p. 164.)

The outstanding elements in Hinduism are thus seen to be the observance of caste rules, which impose a rigid system of social behavior and a restricted circle of social intercourse; reverence for the cow and the Brahman; veneration for the ancient scriptures; worship of certain great gods, such as Vishnu and Siva; pilgrimage to holy places and the cult of rivers.

But Hinduism is more than all this. It is a vast, complex system of customs, philosophies, religious cults, and social regulations.

Christianity's task.—Christianity has for its task the re-interpretation of life for all classes, the establishment of distinctive religious conceptions, and the development of a new economic, political, and social order in India.

INDIA'S POLITICAL UPHEAVAL

Democracy versus autocracy.—A great student of India's history has said, "Autocracy is substantially the only form of government with which the historian of India is concerned." Yet, the whole Indian political horizon today is marked by a struggle for democracy.

Political discontent is no new thing in India. But never has unrest been so widespread and so open as in the years since the World War. That war must be accounted one of the greatest agencies of change in all India's history.

India and the World War. — When Great Britain entered the World War grave doubts were expressed as to the loyalty of India. Undoubtedly England's foes counted upon an uprising in the country, the signal for which was given when the Sultan of Turkey, as caliph, or spiritual head of Islam, proclaimed the Holy War.

A revolt on the part of nearly 70,000,000 Moslems in India, supported by even a few Hindus, would have been disastrous. But India's loyalty was one of the determining factors in the struggle. Indian troops fought on the western front, in Mesopotamia, and in Palestine; and when they were not fighting they released for service other troops in Egypt and in the Far East.

The promise of responsible government. —The effects of the wide contacts of so many Indians in so many parts of the world, of the discussions that followed the armistice, and of England's appreciation of India's loyalty profoundly affected Indian politics. His Majesty the King-Emperor pledged a liberal measure of self-government for India.

The future policy of His Majesty's government was declared to be: "The increasing association of Indians in every branch of administration and the gradual development of self-governing institutions with a view to the progressive realization of responsible government in India as an integral part of the British Empire." To Mr. Edwin S. Montagu, a liberal Secretary of State for India, and Lord Chelmsford, a liberal Viceroy, went the honor and the responsibility of drafting the laws that were to make these reforms in government concrete.

Unfortunately there were long delays in carrying out this policy. In the meantime, agitation increased in India. Some charged that Britain did not mean to redeem its pledges, now that the war had been won. Conservative opinion in England, fearful lest the granting of any measure of self-control should weaken British authority, forced the government to proceed with excessive caution.

Punjab troubles and "Khilafat."—The unrest made some officials nervous. They felt that strenuous efforts should be made to suppress dangerous agitation. The obnoxious Rowlatt Act was passed—a sort of Lusk Law for India. This led to the launching of the movement led by Mr. Mohandas Gandhi.

Feeling ran high. There were violent disturbances, especially in the Punjab. These culminated in the "Amritsar outrage," and the regime of martial law in the Punjab. This was followed by a long imperial investigation. There was, and there still is, profound dissatisfaction with the way in which the whole matter of the Punjab troubles was handled.

"O that I knew where I might find Him!"

In the meantime, the settlement of the fate of Turkey had dragged on. In May, 1920, the terms of the treaty with Turkey were published. They were unsatisfactory to Indian Moslems, who held that in the settlement the pledge made during the war by the Prime Minister had been broken. Mr. Gandhi immediately supported the Mohammedan demands for Turkey and launched his non-cooperative movement, swinging his whole Hindu following to the "Khilafat" cause.

Gandhi's proposals.—

Mr. Gandhi is a lawyer of great ability, a member of the Vaisyo or trading caste of Hindus. He has already distinguished himself as an advocate of the rights of his fellow countrymen in South Africa. Denouncing the British rule as "Satanic," Mr. Gandhi moved the millions of India to attempt to bring the present government to an end by the application of passive non-resistance.

Mr. Gandhi was not in favor of violence. He proposed peace and "non-cooperation" as his method. His program included six points: The surrender of all titles and offices held under the British government; a refusal to attend any government functions; the gradual withdrawal of pupils from schools conducted, supported, or aided by the government; a boycott of the British courts; a refusal to participate in elections; and a boycott of foreign goods, with the use of country-made cloth. This would necessitate the extension on a large scale of hand-spinning and hand-weaving.

Indian troopers in the Mesopotamian campaign

There were attempts to carry out this program, but in most instances the efforts failed. Few national schools were established and the withdrawal of children from government schools was not received with favor. Few renounced titles or boycotted the courts. Seats in the new Legislative Councils were filled. Even the attitude toward the boycott of British goods has changed, for India must import cloth from somewhere.

Mohammedans at prayer, Naini Tal

The breakdown of the non-cooperation movement has not, however, affected Mr. Gandhi's position as a leader.

After the meeting of the Indian National Congress in 1921 there followed a period of violent agitation in spite of Mr. Gandhi's position. And early in 1922 there were serious local outbreaks, which led Mr. Gandhi and his followers temporarily to abandon his program of non-cooperation.

On March 18, 1922, Mr. Gandhi, after pleading guilty to conspiracy to overthrow the government, was sentenced to six years' imprisonment. Before entering prison he warned his followers against any resort to violence, which he termed "barbarous, impracticable, utterly futile, unclean." At this writing, that injunction is being obeyed, and, on the surface, India is quieter than for some months.

No one expects this calm to continue indefinitely, but, in the meantime, the moderates who favor co-operating under the Montagu reforms, seem to be gaining some ground. All depends upon the spirit and the speed with which Great Britain enlarges her grants of self-government to India.

An Indian estimate of Gandhi.—Even in prison Mr. Gandhi remains one of the world's great figures. An editorial in the Indian Social Reformer in May, 1922, is very illuminating:

Ecce Homo: We reprint today the comments of the Vedic Magazine, the monthly organ of the Gurukula section of the Arya Samaj, on the persecution and imprisonment of Mahatma Gandhi. It is curious that, while it has shaken the faith of some people like the Maharashtra Sub-Committee of Nagpur in the efficacy of morality and non-violence as a political method, it has prompted a much larger number, including several who had set themselves for years to counteract the work of Christian missions, to turn to the figure of Christ on the Cross in reverent contemplation. Orthodox Hindus, militant Arya Samajists, devout Mohammedans, and of course Brahmos have had their minds turned to Calvary in commenting upon the event. It may be said without exaggeration that the Mahatma in jail has achieved in a short while what Christian missions had not done in a hundred years with all their resources of men and money—he has turned India's face to Christ upon the Cross. Some missionaries who understand this rejoice in their hearts, while some, we fear, are rather jealous that God has blessed the Mahatma's sacrifice more than their own devotion. Strange, too, is it not, that this should happen under a Viceroy of the ancient race which, though it gave Christ to humanity, has since then withstood Christianity more zealously than any other. Reflections such as these may seem irrelevant or out of taste to politicians whose business lies on the surface of things, but they furnish a clue to the unfolding of the deep purpose of history.

Gandhi's fundamental aims.—Mr. Gandhi is a patriot. But he is not committed to a program of political separation from the British Empire. He declared early in 1922:

"If British rule were replaced tomorrow by Indian rule based on modern methods, India would be no better, except that then she would be able to retain some of the money that is now drained away to England." He opposed successfully, in December, 1921, the effort in the Indian National Congress to declare for self-government outside the British Empire. This position is quite generally supported in India today.

Fundamentally, Gandhi is leading India in revolt against the rule of a civilization that he believes to be hopelessly materialistic, in the hope that the future India may be controlled by spiritual forces. He sees the dangers that are coming to India in the factory system from the West, in economic and political institutions. From these he would protect and deliver his country.

"India is now suffering from reaction against the more materialistic manifestations of western civilization. In addition to this, the events of the Punjab disturbances of 1919, which only became fully known during the period under review, gave rise among educated Indians to feelings of intense and bitter humiliation. Against the all-dominant tide of western materialism, western might, and western achievement, Mr. Gandhi, with his explicit scorn for that which we call modern civilization, stands before the injured national pride of many of his countrymen like a rock of salvation. He embodies an other-worldliness essentially Indian, a spirit the West does not possess, a plane of detachment to which it cannot hope to aspire. Hence it is that his behests have the influence of semi-divine commands; and even those whose intellects are too keen to be dominated by his sway can rarely be found to resist the appeal which he makes to their innermost hearts." (India during 1920, p. 39.)

First steps toward self - government. — The reform acts have been put into operation. The first elections were held in 1920, and, while not participated in by Mr. Gandhi's followers, elected Indians to positions where they have to administer education, public works, forests, agriculture, sanitation, and direct industrial development. The administration of the army, navy, police, telegraph, railway, other revenue departments, and courts remains in British hands.

Already there is insistence upon the extension of self-government and political agitation continues. This is supported by the measure of success which has attended the new governments. Of the initial efforts of Indians in government, it is said that "the non-official members of the Legislative Assembly and Council of State, which now control an absolute majority over any number of votes which Government can possibly command, have throughout revealed a sense of responsibility, of sobriety, and of statesmanship, which has surpassed the most sanguine expectations even of those who believed most firmly in India's capacity for responsible government... The first session of the Reformed Parliament of India has more than justified the faith displayed in the capacity of Indians by Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford. It has shown that the process of entrusting responsibility to Indian statesmen calls out in return a rare degree of capacity for discharging the obligations which that responsibility entails." (India during 1920, pp. 71, 74.)

Mohandas K. Gandhi—Seer

The indications, from reports from India in the early months of this year (1923), are that, to secure self-government with the least possible delay, an increasing number of leaders of the Indian National Congress are abandoning non-cooperation and are advocating entering the elections. With seats gained in the Councils it is their hope there to advocate and secure further constitutional reforms.

The call to Christianity.—The whole outlook and program of patriotic India has changed in the last four years. There is a greater difference between the India of today and the India of the days when the Centenary program was being formulated, than between the India of that day (1916) and the India of the Mutiny (1857.) It is this profound change that makes imperative an immediate reappraisal of the policy and program of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India. Christian leadership, with its experience in democratic government and its social ideals, has a great responsibility in the shaping of coming events.

INDIA AS SHE IS TODAY

India's health.—There are certain great changes that must be wrought in India before the political evolution can be completed. These changes can best be stated in terms of present-day conditions.

One of India's greatest obstacles to progress is physical. The average life of an Indian is only 24.7 years. The death rate is high (31.8 per 1,000) as compared with Japan (21.9), and still higher as compared with countries of the West. (America's is 14.1.)

The death rate of infants is exceedingly high. "Official statistics show that there is scarcely a large town in India in which the rate is not above 200, and in many of the largest towns it is more than 400." (Fleming, Building with India, p. 32.) "It has been calculated that every year no fewer than 2,000,000 Indian babies die, while many others survive only to grow up weak and feeble, from unhygienic surroundings during infancy...

No less than fifty per cent of all the children in Bombay die before reaching the age of eighteen months; while in Delhi, one infant out of every four born in 1919 was doomed to die within the first year." (India during 1920, pp. 151, 153.)

Plague, cholera, and other scourges reap a large harvest. Investigations so far completed show from forty to eighty per cent of the people infected with hookworm. Tuberculosis is on the increase.

A change in these conditions depends upon the spread of knowledge, the removal of poverty, and a change in certain customs.

India's poverty.—India's poverty is appalling. Says Dr. Fleming: "If per capita wealth of India be taken as 1, that of Japan would be 3.7; Canada, 18.5; the United Kingdom, 22.8; and the United States, 27.9....In some areas people speak of poverty as their 'mother.'

"...That there is a terrible amount of actual hunger in Indian villages during certain months before the harvest is a fact beyond dispute. Some low-caste villagers near Benares said that they ate only once in two days for a month or two in the cold weather before the Rabi (winter) harvest when they get the pulses and barley.

"An extended tour among the villages leaves one with the impression of poorness, of life reduced to the barest necessities of existence, of men, women, and children escaping starvation but living below a level of most meager comfort. . . The supreme concern of the people during nine-tenths of the villager's waking hours is to meet the demand of his stomach and his children's stomach." (Building with India, pp. 42-43.)

The average income of the entire population of India is less than twenty dollars per year. Government tax collectors have discovered that only one person in 1,000 has an income of more than $330 a year.

Poverty drives many to mortgage themselves to the money-lenders. For two or four rupees a year (three rupees approximately equal one American dollar) and two pieces of cloth, these unfortunates remain in servitude until the debt, compounded by outrageous rates of interest, is discharged. This may keep the family in virtual slavery for generations.

While this is not a general condition it suggests the almost universal condition of debt and of high interest payments. Rates on small loans run as high as seventy-two per cent a year. Rates below twenty-five per cent for loans in rural areas are rare.

One of the greatest problems confronting Christianity in India today is the relief of the poor. This includes the solution of agricultural and industrial problems.

India's industry.—More than eighty-five per cent of the people of India devote their lives to agriculture, as landlords, as cultivators, or as day laborers. It is primitive farming—plowing with a wooden plow with an iron point, while the ox treads out the grain and the fanning is done by the passing breeze. In countless homes two women still grind the day's meal, sitting at the family hand-mill.

Primitive methods do not allow sufficient diversity in crop nor do they produce by any means as much as the soil might yield. The great poverty of India is connected with its soil. Low wages, often in kind, are insufficient to meet adequately the needs of the rural population.

But India is experiencing an industrial development. Particular attention is being given textile manufactures, and attempts are being made to revive that ancient industry.

When Europeans first entered India they found it a land producing such fine prints, embroideries, linens and jewels that for eighty years the British East

Primitive plow and seeder still used in India

India Company was able to pay its bondholders profits averaging annually 117 per cent. But when, after the invention of the power loom and the establishment of the factory system, the manufacturers of Great Britain demanded protection for their infant industries, such tariffs were placed on the exportation of India's goods that her looms were silenced.

In 1823 a director of the British East India Company testified that "the cotton fabrics of India, hitherto her staple product, have not only been displaced, but we are exporting cotton into India. India is thus reduced from the state of manufacturing to that of an agricultural country."

In 1840 a House of Commons investigation showed that, "In 1814 India exported 1,250,000 pieces of cotton goods to England; in 1835 only 360,000 pieces." During the same period British exports of machine-made cottons into India had risen from 818,000 yards to 51,000,000.

Since the beginning of this century the determination of many Indians to restore the ancient glories of India's loom crafts has brought about the Swadeshi movement. This is a campaign for the use by Indians of home-made goods, and the boycott of those made in foreign countries, especially those made in England. Opposed at first by the government, the exigencies of war-time induced the authorities to give it support. As a result, not only have native manufacturers increased rapidly in the last few years, but there are now factories capable of supplying part of the needs of the people.

India's labor problem.—With the development of India's industries goes the problem of labor. As the people come from the land to work at the machines they too often find themselves at the mercy of an industrial system of the most unenlightened order.

Wages are low. In eight industries, cotton, wool, paper, rice, brewing, jute, coal, and tea, workers in 1919 were earning an average of seventeen cents per day. Government investigation has shown that mills without electric lights run a thirteen and one half hour day in summer and eleven hour day in winter. Mills in Calcutta lighted by electricity run from 4:30 in the morning to 8:30 at night. Cotton-ginning mills were found to run from twelve to eighteen hours a day during the rush season, and rice and flour mills sometimes as high as from twenty to twenty-two hours. Operatives were required to spend a large part of each Sunday at the mills cleaning their machines.

Child labor is common. The laws to restrict it have been lax, and even these frequently flouted. Children over nine may be employed on "half-time," that is, from seven and one half to eight hours a day. It is generally admitted that a large proportion of the "half-timers" employed are less than nine years old.

The rise of this sort of conscienceless industrialism, with its starvation wages, long hours and child labor, is resulting in producing industrial unrest. The government blue book reports: "The year 1920 has been one of unprecedented economic restlessness in India—restlessness which has afforded a great stimulus to the organization of labor.... During the period under view nearly five hundred strikes, some of them of considerable importance, have taken place up and down India. Not a few protracted strikes, accompanied in some cases with disorder, occurred in most of the important industrial centers of India, particularly Madras, Calcutta, and Bombay.... Many strikes throughout the year have been followed almost immediately by an increase of wages ranging from ten to thirty per cent, and a reduction of working hours. It is probable that a certain number of strikes in 1920, more particularly those in the coal fields as well as in the railway and postal services, were not unconnected with the non-cooperative movement.... But in general it may be said that the strikes throughout the year have been predominately economic in origin, and in most cases directly caused by the fact that wages have lagged seriously behind prices in their upward course." (India during 1920, pp. 140, 142.)

There are yet not more than 1,500,000 employees in the factories of India, but the number is increasing every year. There is need for an entirely different basis for the developing industrial life.

Mr. Gandhi's advocacy of home industry represents but one phase of the problem which is as wide as industrial life. The factory system is increasing rapidly in India. The whole range of its activities requires Christian treatment.

Woman labor in the jute industry—Calcutta

India's castes.—Poverty is one of the causes of the appalling brevity of life in India. Another is infant marriage. This custom suggests in turn the whole system of caste.

Caste is the outstanding social institution of India. Its roots run far back. It is the most vital principle of Hinduism, dominating Indian social life, manners, morals, and thought. Hindu society is divided into about 3,000 mutually exclusive groups and these in turn are composed of about 19,000 sub-castes or caste divisions. These groups are separated from each other by rules of diet and of marriage. Transition from one caste to another is, except in some cases among the lowest groups, impossible. Each individual is born in the stratum of society in which he belongs. There he should remain.

The caste system includes a whole group of untouchables, outcastes. It is estimated that these number nearly 55,000,000. The very names, "outcaste," "pariah," "untouchable," suggest the contempt in which these people have been held and in which they have been condemned to live. Gathered in mud huts on the outskirts of the villages, or sometimes in little settlements of their own, these wretches live in a squalor that has no likeness in the West, forbidden to walk on certain streets or to send their children to the village school, and forbidden the use of the village wells.

The orthodox Hindu attitude toward these miserables has been one of entire complacency, because, according to the doctrine of transmigration, these people are merely suffering their just punishment for sins committed in a previous incarnation, and must work out the penalty, if, in their next cycle of life, they are to find their way into caste. Many castes believe themselves defiled if waited upon by servants of a lower caste. "In Southern India, where caste has been most strictly enforced, even the shadow of a lower caste man defiles, and there is a graduated scale of distances which the lower caste must observe. The Kammalan group, including masons, blacksmiths, carpenters and leather workers, pollute at twenty-four feet, toddy-drawers at thirty-nine feet, Pulayan or Chernman cultivators at forty-eight feet, and pariahs, beef-eaters, at sixty-four feet." (India's Silent Revolution, p. 62.)

"The idea that all men are alike in the sight of God," says E. C. Moore, "is one which seems to us near the heart of the gospel. It is almost the last conviction possible to the mind of a Hindu." (The Spread of Christianity in the Modern World, p. 125.) Still, there is a growing self-consciousness on the part of Hindu society with regard to the untouchable mass.

A noted Indian has thus described the situation: "The curse of untouchability prevails to this day in all parts of India. It is not mere untouchability. It is worse than that. While all of the depressed classes have been for centuries untouchable, some have been unshadowable, some unapproachable and some even unseeable by the higher castes, and this degradation has been impressed by these castes of Hindu society upon one fifth of the total population of their own country, race and creed—on thirty per cent of the Hindu population of India. Out of every ten Hindus three are treated as beyond the pale of decent humanity." (India during 1920, quoting Sir Narayan Chandavarkar, p. 155.)

There is a growing concern for these depressed people. Mr. Gandhi is lending all the support of his leadership to the forwarding of the movement for the removal of the stigma of untouchability. Practically all the reform societies in India have declared against the worst features of the caste system.

Untouchability is not the only evil of caste, for it is a disintegrating influence tending to social division and intense class pride even in its higher levels.

The main attack of Christianity on caste has been upon its attitude toward the outcaste. Protestant Christianity has been telling India now for more than a hundred years that there are no people outside of the pale of humanity. In increasing numbers the outcastes have been listening to the message until, in the last decade, they have come by the hundreds of thousands to knock at the door of the church. Thus the "Mass Movement" is seen to be social as well as religious in significance.

This sight of thousands turning to what has been contemptuously branded as "foreign religion" has awakened progressive Hindus. "The possibility of losing the untouchables has shaken the intelligent section of the Hindu community to its very depths, and were it not for long-established prejudices and deep-rooted habits, untouchableness would soon be a thing of the past," says Lajpat Rai.

The message of brotherhood preached by the Christian missionary has effected this change in caste attitude. It can be only through the intensification of Christian emphasis upon the need for equality and brotherhood that the tyranny of caste can be abolished.

The problem of caste in India, affecting as it does one-fifth of the world's population, stands as one of the greatest present challenges to Christianity.

India's illiteracy.—Questions of health, poverty and caste are all inter-related, and at the same time relate themselves with that of illiteracy as contributing problems yet to be brought to complete solution by Christian forces.

Illiteracy is an outstanding fact in India. India now thrills with the longing for popular government. But "in responsible government everything depends upon the electorate. It can succeed only when the citizens have an understanding of public affairs....Thoughtful minds may well hesitate to embark on the experiment of responsible government in a country far larger than any in which democracy has yet been tried, where the differences of race and language and religion are wider and deeper than among any other people, and where, out of a population of 318,000,000 only 18,000,000 are able to read and write." (Our Christian Debt to India, by J. H. Oldham, pp, 3, 4.)

It is impossible to overstate the difficulty of the task confronting any government that seeks to educate the masses of India. Poverty makes it impossible for many of the hard-driven families to keep their children long enough in school, for unless the child works, how shall he be fed? Social custom and religion keep unnumbered thousands of girls out of the classroom. The task of recruiting teachers for so many millions, especially in a land where the schoolmaster does not receive much pay or a high place in social regard, is tremendous.

Having been aroused to its responsibility largely by the schools founded by the great Scotch missionary, Alexander Duff, the British have been working since early in the eighteenth century to lift the curse of illiteracy that still handicaps eighty-nine per cent of men and ninety-nine per cent of the women of India. The sincerity of this effort must be acknowledged.

India's present educational system is largely the result of the policy adopted in 1835, when Macaulay said, "Our efforts ought to be directed to make natives of this country thoroughly good English scholars." Macaulay believed that there was no native culture in India worth using as the base for a modern system of education, and so indorsed an ideal that has planted in India schools, from primary grade to university, as nearly as possible identical with those in England.

The result has been that the upper castes, the Brahmins, and the wealthy of all castes, seeing in the schools the only road to official position or membership in one of the honored professions, have filled them with their children. The poor and the depressed have been practically excluded from the schools.

The whole educational system is under discussion. Not only what ought to be taught, but also the question of the right of all, of whatever caste or outcaste group, to the opportunities of the general schools is being agitated.

The time has come for revision of primary education, as well as higher education; for the introduction of vocational training; for a complete reconstruction along modern lines. A new demand for education is arousing. The effect of the war upon the much traveled Indian soldier has been that he sees the significance of education for his boy and also for his women folk.

The condition of illiteracy is sufficiently startling. Saint Nihal Singh says that four out of every five villages in India are without educational facilities of any kind, and that eighty per cent of the children of school age are receiving no instruction.

Christianity, with a growing church in India, is here confronted with one of its greatest problems, education.

THE CHURCH OF CHRIST IN INDIA

How Christianity came to India.—Tradition, which cannot be traced further back than the fourth century, holds that India proved the final goal for the labors of St. Thomas, one of the twelve apostles. Christian missionaries certainly reached India before the end of the second century.

But India did not begin to play an important part in Christian history until the opening of the sixteenth century, when Francis Xavier went out to evangelize the Portuguese colonies established there. Protestant Christianity made its appearance in India in the eighteenth century.

To William Carey, the translator, and to Alexander Duff, the educator, we owe the leadership which has resulted in the great Protestant efforts of the last hundred years.

The Mutiny of 1857 was a turning point in missionary advance. Since then progress has been rapid, and the increase of missionary agencies remarkable.

How the church has grown.—The growth of the Christian church in India, as the chart on page 79 shows, has been almost unbelievable, especially since the beginning of the mass movements. The Protestant population has increased from 198,100 to more than 3,000,000 in the sixty years between 1860 and 1920. When the census of 1911 was made public it was discovered that the number of Protestant Christians in India was increasing almost six times as fast as the population!

"Roughly speaking, it may be stated that the Indian Christians in the Indian Empire numbered one in 143 in 1890, one in 111 in 1901, and one in 86 in 1911."

Today Christianity is growing faster than any other religion in India. During the decade that closed in 1911, while the population of India increased by only 6.5 per cent, and the Hindus by only 5.1 per cent, the Moslems 8.1 per cent, and the Buddhists 11 per cent, the Christians increased by 32.9 per cent, and Protestant Christians by 49.6 per cent!

The church in India has grown, during the second half of its course, at thirty times the rate during the first half! And the calls today come from hundreds of thousands of seekers who cannot be answered, because the church at large has not yet taken to heart the challenge of the opportunity God is holding before it in India.

The church coming of age.—The surest evidence of the success of this century of effort, however, is not to be found in any tabulation of accessions, but in the changing spirit within the Indian church itself. The days of infancy, when leadership rested almost entirely in the hands of the "missionary sahib," are gone. Even such phrases as "native helpers," used freely a generation ago, are heard no longer. The Church of Christ in India, of, by, and for Indians, is coming of age.

It is well that this is so. Because we have become so accustomed to dealing with Christianity under Western forms, we have been tempted to think that those are the only forms in which it can reveal itself. But it is safe to say that the principal opposition to Christianity in India today comes from its Western associations. India is full of men who read the Christian scriptures, who reverence Christ, who seek to live in accordance with the principles taught by Jesus, yet who hold themselves aloof from the Christian church.

This puts plainly before Christianity in India the necessity of showing that the church in that country is to be free to mold its own life and thought. In leadership, as well as in membership, it must be Indian. And in pointing the way toward the future the Methodist Episcopal Church has an honorable part.

METHODISM IN INDIA

The founders.—The Methodist Episcopal Church sent its first missionaries to India in 1856, in the person of Dr. and Mrs. William Butler. Since no Indian pastors were ready immediately to carry the work to the people, the American Presbyterian mission offered the services of the Rev. Joel T. Janvier, who thus heads the long line of Indian Methodist preachers, as Dr. Butler's name leads the missionaries.

During the Mutiny of 1857, the work was broken up, as was that of all missions. But as soon as the storm passed Dr. Butler took possession of strategic points in the territory which Methodism designed to work. In this he had the support of the great pioneers, James M. Thoburn, E. W. Parker, J. W. Waugh, and J. H. Messmore.

The spread.—Dr. Thoburn invited William Taylor—Taylor of California—to come to India to hold services for the spiritual uplift of the Indians in the Methodist territory. Taylor came. Nothing much happened. Then the evangelist became convinced that he had been called to preach to the English-speaking communities in the great cities all over the Indian empire. He went. In the main his message was confined to the Anglo-Indians. Nominally these were included in the Anglican community. Actually, they were almost entirely neglected spiritually. A great revival broke out. Churches were established for the conservation of its results. These churches felt the responsibility toward the masses at their doors.

That is the history of the expansion of Methodism from the provinces of Oudh and Rohikland to borders of the empire of India. Trace the march of William Taylor, from Oudh to Bombay, Hyderabad, Madras, Calcutta, Poona, Bangalore, Jubbulpore, Allahabad, Asansol, Cawnpore, Agra, Ajmere, Karachi, Quetta and other places, and you can trace the outline of the Methodist map.

The Methodist community.—The Methodist Episcopal Church now has in India a Christian community embracing 405,562 persons. This is more than is reported from all the other foreign mission fields of the church combined!

The increasing power of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India can be somewhat gauged from reflection that, in its first thirty-three years, it enrolled approximately 13,000 adherents; in the second thirty-three years it won 392,000 others!

Note the strategic location on railway lines

Varieties of missionary work.—The work has been as varied as any missionary work in the world. There has been preaching, such as must always constitute the backbone of missionary effort. When preaching has led to interest, as in the case of the outcastes, training classes for village leaders (chaudris) have been formed, in which, by intensive instruction, the principle of geometrical progression might be employed, namely, one missionary instructs one chaudri; one chaudri instructs a hundred villagers!

From the beginning education has been featured. The Methodist Episcopal Church has today in India 1,513 schools of all grades, with 43,140 pupils. Lord Reading, viceroy, sent a message in 1922 to be read at the annual meeting of the executive board of our church, in which he said: "Every administrator in India must acknowledge that the educational system of India was created and developed by missionaries; that many of the reform movements in society and government today have been brought to pass by missionaries; that the human contacts of one color and race to another color and race which are creating a new India were the direct result of the preaching and practice of the brotherhood of man by the missionaries."

High on the list of the great achievements must be put the opening of higher education to the women of India by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of

Colporteur selling Bibles at railway station, India

The medical missionary, although handicapped by lack of adequate equipment, has always been a "missionary and half," able to establish contacts in the face of prejudice and often to penetrate where no other type of Christian worker can go. Particularly has this been true in the case of women physicians.

There have been missionaries who have sought to improve agricultural methods, and lift the people from their poverty. Others have introduced new industrial processes. Others have conducted co-operative loan associations, to rescue the villagers from the rapacity of the native money lender. Men have never hesitated to undertake any kind of work that offered hope of breaking the power of superstition, ignorance, disease.

So the work has grown. The mass movements have come among the untouchables and given the Methodist Church an additional responsibility for the spiritual care of 6,000,000 people.

Work among the outcastes.—It was almost the last decade of the nineteenth century before unusual results began to attend this increased work. But during the '80s the Protestant missions began to make their first determined approach to the submerged outcastes. A fear of losing touch with the majority in the castes had, before that, deterred most of the missions from work among the pariahs.

That fear has proved unfounded. Not only have the outcastes responded in enormous masses to a message which offers them a right to stand on their feet as equals of all the other sons of the Heavenly Father, but even the Hindu recognizes as valid the obligation which the gospel lays upon us to preach to the outcaste and honors the ideals of the Christian faith. Practically every reform movement within Hinduism today, and they are numerous, places the overthrow of the rigid caste system within its program.

The movement toward Christianity has affected several million of the 55,000,000 outcastes. It might have reached the whole group had not the missions, from the beginning, feared that disaster might come from receiving into Christian membership more seekers than could be adequately instructed. Roman Catholicism has had much experience with so-called mass conversions, not always happy. Protestantism has stood for the necessity of each soul winning a spiritual experience of its own. The effort to satisfy the desires of these millions of Indians, awakened by Christian preaching, yet to safeguard the church from illiteracy, religious unpreparedness, or wrong motives, has taxed the highest wisdom of the missions.

In the footsteps of Isabella Thoburn.—India will always hold a treasured place in the hearts of all members of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, for it was there that Methodism's great pioneer in educational missions for women, Isabella Thoburn, set up that magnificent school which, as the Isabella Thoburn College, is now in effect the women's college of Lucknow University. Mrs. Parker, the widow of Bishop Parker, is today one of the few surviving founders of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and lives in the midst of the work whose marvelous growth has come before her eyes.

In this volume there is not room to describe the work of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society in India as distinct from that of the Board of Foreign Missions. Nor, in thinking of Indian Methodism, should there be any distinction made. Missionaries of the two societies work side by side, bearing their appropriate parts in a single program.

The efforts of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society have been of particular importance in India because of the rigid seclusion in which many of India's women have lived. Women have gone with the gospel where no man could ever have penetrated. Women educators have broken down prejudice to the point where large student bodies of girls have been gathered. Women physicians have brought healing and given birth to confidence within many a rigidly guarded zenana.

No picture of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India is complete that does not give large place to this work conducted by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society.

INDIA AND THE CENTENARY

What the Centenary proposed.—In 1916, the church, about to celebrate its Missionary Centenary, asked India what it needed to carry its work to the goals then in view. It will be remembered that India, estimating for five years, on the basis of conditions as they were in 1916, asked:

For the maintenance of the work then in existence, including the support of the 235 missionaries and the 6,435 Indian workers$2,552,000

For the building of 275 new churches, 100 new schools, 450 houses for pastors, 1,000 houses for teachers, 45 houses for missionaries$2,800,682

For the endowment of institutions$1,183,500

For the support of 98 new missionaries and 2,364 new Indian workers$1,594,140

A total of $8,130,322

Isabella Thoburn College, Lucknow

Of this, of course, only the last three items (totaling $5,578,322) could be regarded as carrying out the purposes of advance that underlay the Centenary.

It was a critical moment when the Centenary laid out this program for India. Methodism entered that land just as the storm of the Mutiny broke. It planned this advance just as the storm of the World War, with its ensuing storm of nationalistic agitation, swept the country into a new age.

No man will contend that the Centenary program, as outlined above, was adequate to the need, even in 1916. But it surely was providential in saving the work of the church to an effort equal to that of the past. All the factors of increasing cost that were felt in other lands operated in India. The budget that was expected to keep the work begun prior to 1916 in operation would, unincreased, hardly have sufficed to keep half the work going. Fearful retreat must have occurred, had it not been for the enlarged support made possible by the Centenary.

WHAT THE CENTENARY HAS ACCOMPLISHED

New missionaries.—Since the beginning of the Centenary period, the Methodist Episcopal Church has sent ninety-one new missionaries to India and Burma. Eleven of these went to Burma; one to India as an agricultural missionary, three were nurses.

The estimated need for new missionaries for India from 1918 to 1922, as announced in the Centenary surveys was ninety-eight. Additional vacancies have of course occurred from deaths and retirements, and later estimates of requirements indicate greater need of workers than appeared in 1918, but the fact remains that the ninety-one new missionaries have gone a long way toward meeting the estimated personnel needs of India and Burma.

Increasing the Indian staff.—The original Centenary surveys estimated that 2,364 additions to the Indian staff would be required by the end of 1922. Statistics compiled by the Board of Foreign Missions show that the number of Indian workers—pastors, teachers and hospital aids—in 1922 was 8,542, an increase of 2,107 over the 1918 figures. This figure shows an increase of thirty-three per cent in the Indian staff in four years, the greatest advance made in Methodist activity in India in any four years of our mission work.

An increase in support.—In 1918 the total amount available for Methodist missionary work in India (exclusive of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society) was $508,581. The amount for 1922, due to the Centenary campaign, increased to $873,774—a gain of seventy-three per cent.

New buildings.—While Centenary askings have almost been reached in the matter of staff, the building program has not been so fortunate. But, despite all, a great advance in the number of new schools and churches is registered. Every district of every conference has new buildings made possible in part by Centenary funds. Many are fine brick and stone structures; others are not so pretentious.

In the Calcutta Area.—Reports reaching the Board of Foreign Missions show new church buildings or new properties built or acquired during the years 1919, 1920 and 1921, at the following centers of missionary work in the Indian portion of the Calcutta Area: Sarakdihi and Jhanjra; while Hindustani churches have been organized in Calcutta and Gomoh, and new circuits have been organized at Barakar, Hirapur, Murulia, Rampur, and Badilpur.

In the Bombay Area.—There are new churches built or properties purchased at: Umerkhed, Tentukhora, Barman, Katangi, Khirala, Emidpur, Golkhera, Jeswara, Roshnai, Harsood, Purina, Dabi, Rangoon, Mokalgaoon, Kandri Camp, Karwari, Balaghat, Warraseoni, Lamta, Lanji, Jubbulpore, Sadar Church (Jubbulpore), Pachmari, Gaulkera, Mundi, Gandar, Patan, Gundardehi—all in the Central Provinces Conference; and at Purma, Bombay, and Colaba in the Bombay Conference. Property has been purchased in the heart of the city of Bombay for twin churches which are planned to accommodate congregations holding services in four separate languages.

Bombay Conference reports also forty new Sunday schools opened, with a new "Mission to Servants" among the Gujaratis at Colaba. In the newly organized Gujarat Conference mission work has been extended into the Bheel country with a station in Bari, capital city of Bari State, and also in Shera and Lunawada. New mission stations have been opened at Risol, Kalmanuri, Doripuri, Ichapur, and Pavar.

In the Lucknow Area.—From Tirhut District, North India Conference, comes word of new work opened up among the Mallah, Koori, Dusadh, Dom, Sweeper, Chamar, Murwari, Khatri, Baniya, and Brahman castes, and among the Moham-medans. The Northwest India Conference reported 23,800 baptisms in a single year of the Centenary period. A church and school have been taken over from a British society at Ahrura. Mission stations, including church and school buildings, have been taken over from German societies now forbidden to operate in India, at Baxar, Dehri-on Sone, Darehanga, Muriaro, and Samastipur. Eleven new circuits have been organized in Lucknow Area and four circuit center buildings have been erected.

New church buildings have been erected on properties purchased at the following centers in Lucknow Area: Delhi, Pagain, Sassaram, Jagdishpur, Nurpur, Bijnor, Gonda, Pali, Bhim Tal, Bairagnia, Muzzaffarnagar, Ahraura, Cawnpore, Nanpara, Samastipur, Sitamarhki, Hiya-Ghat, Sonapat, Purwa, and Fursatgunj; while Ramni, Nandpryag, and Landsdowne have been reoccupied, and new stations have been opened at Rountella, Panani, Karnpryag, Pitagarh, Ranikshet, and Katiyari.

There are more than 1,000,000 people living in the native state of Bhawalpore, adjoining the Northwest India Conference. In 1920 the Methodist Church was enabled to enter this territory with the Christian message; it promises to be a fruitful field.

The report of the Board of Foreign Missions for 1921 shows ownership of 176 more parsonages and missionary homes than in 1918. Some of these have been built, others have been purchased; some are modern homes, others are little more than mud houses.

Training Christian workers.—One of the important features of the advance made possible in Methodist missionary endeavor in India by the Centenary is the organization of a number of new training schools for district workers, and the erection of several buildings for such schools. A training school has been opened in Jagdalpur for young men speaking the Oriya language—the first school of its kind in that tongue; there are twenty men enrolled. The Bible Training School at Kolar has been reopened.

From 1919 to 1921 the new buildings were erected for the training schools at Narsingpet, Bidar, Pani, Sonapat, and Lahore; while new training schools have been organized at Quetta, Sambhal, Aligarh and Gonda.

Lucknow Christian College.—Fifty thousand dollars of Centenary money appropriated by the Board of Foreign Missions, has made it possible for Lucknow Christian College to accept a grant of $103,000 from the British government, and purchase new property, erect four new buildings and develop the institution as the highest ranking Methodist college in India. Lucknow Christian College is now an outstanding memorial to Methodist missions; it enrolls 700 of the most promising boys and young men of the land.

Other schools.—New buildings have also been erected in connection with the Philander Smith College at Naini Tal, the Anglo-Vernacular School in Trwante, Collins Institute in Calcutta, the Godhra Boys' School, the Poona Marathani High School, the Narsinghpur High School, the Boys' School at Bidar, the Pauri High School, the Parker Memorial High School at Moradabad, the Hardoi Boys' School, the Lahore Boys' School.

New sites have been secured or buildings purchased or erected for schools in Gomak, Suri, Asansol, Baroda (high school), Barman, Baihar, Katangi, Tenchukhera, Burgi, Jubbulpore, Sitapur, Than, Paidol, Ramni, Muzaffarpur, Bombay (high school), Hagain, Rudrapryag, Pipli and Kotdwara, Cawnpore.

A demonstration farm and school is now in operation in Pakaur, one among the families of the fireclay and brick workers at Rumarduli and Chauch, a Boys' Boarding School in Tamruk, a boarding school at Wari Bunder for boys speaking the Gujarati tongue, an Anglo-Vernacular School at Ranikhet, and other new schools in Umerkhad and Hyderabad.

The old thatched bungalow that formerly served the Thoburn Biblical Institute has been replaced by a brick structure, and additional land has been purchased for the compound. At the boarding school in Bidar departments in the Telegu and in the Urdu tongues were organized in 1920.

In addition to these schools—which do not include those opened or built during 1922—a large number of primary schools and kindergarten classes have been organized in every district of every conference. No adequate statistics of these schools are available, but partial reports for single years show such increases as nine on Ahmedabad District, twelve on Baroda District, twelve on Gokak District, two on Madras District, twelve on Roorkee district.

A broadening medical ministry.—Near Ajmere, in the Indus River Conference, forty-five acres of land have been purchased for a tuberculosis sanitarium, which is being rapidly developed. Thirty-three suites of rooms have been added to the Thoburn Memorial Hospital, Nadiad. The sanitarium at Pachmari has been enlarged; two buildings have been added to the sanitarium at Kalow. The hospital at Bidar has been reopened, and a doctor appointed to conduct it. The first of a series of dispensaries has been opened in Calcutta. On the Lucknow Area, the Leper Asylum formerly conducted by the German Mission at Muzaffarpur has been taken over, and the Leper Home at Roorkee. A small hospital building has been erected at Bijnor and a new orphanage opened at Hissar.

Total property increases.—Due in part to new buildings and improved properties made possible by the Centenary and in part to normal increases in value, it is estimated that property owned by the Methodist Episcopal Church in India is worth $1,153,717 more today than it was in 1918.

INDIA'S RESPONSE TO THE CENTENARY

Even more important has been the reflex action of the Centenary on the church in India. The church was alive before 1916 in that country; now it is aflame. A great Centenary movement burst out among Indian Christians, which has been carried down to every charge and resulted in the adoption of a church-wide program having as its goals:

Indigenous leadership must win India to Christ

Evangelistic.—Doubling the number of full members.

Reaching a Sunday school enrolment of a quarter of a million.

Doubling the number of workers receiving instruction in theological and Bible-training schools.

Reaching a baptized Methodist community of half a million.

Pinning a Centenary badge on a contributor

Enrolling 5,000 chaudris to give Christian instruction to their villages.

Enrolling a time legion of 10,000 persons, each pledged to give a minimum of two hours of voluntary evangelistic service every week.

Educational.—Making the entire teaching staff of all mission schools Christian.

Tripling the number of Christian students studying in mission colleges and high schools.

Establishing 500 additional village primary schools, and doubling the attendance of Christian children.

Making each middle school a recruiting ground for higher education.

Making each high school and college a recruiting ground for Christian service.

A growing church.—While definite reports for only three years of the Centenary period are now available, it is shown that already there has been an addition of 34,232 members to the church roll,

The missionary talking in a mohalla, Agra

44,629 to the number of Sunday-school pupils, and 2,000 to the enrolment in schools of all grades. The number of Sunday schools has already increased by 697 over that at the opening of the Centenary period.

An indigenous power.—Under the inspiration of the Centenary the Methodist Conferences of India have organized a Board of Home and Foreign Missions which is laying plans for the evangelization of a hitherto untouched field lying between Allahabad and Jubbulpore. This work will be entirely supported by the church in India.

Great devotion has also been shown in the increase in contributions from $159,699 in 1918 to $257,679 in 1921. This increase is equal to 93,940 rupees. Since one rupee is a day's wage for the average Indian Christian, this increase in giving represents on the part of Indian Methodists about what would be represented by an advance of $1,469,700 by a similar number of American workmen, figuring the average wage of the American at five dollars per day.

This showing is the more remarkable in view of the fact that it has taken place during a period marked by great unrest, and while an epidemic that carried off thousands of church members held the increase in the total population of India to one and two-tenths per cent during the decade closing in 1921.

INDIA AND CHRIST—NOW!

Hark to the words that come from India today. "The future of India was never so uncertain as today. Life and thought are in flux, and in every department of effort we are passing through a period of transition. All are thinking, not of the India that is, but of the India to be. What is to be is not yet evident. One thing is clear and sure—she is not what she always has been. India's greater future has already begun. She has taken a new direction, but her goal is not yet in view.

Song service led by an old pastor, Allahabad

"The coming of new inventions and progressive ideas will not of itself help India in its search for spiritual truth. One may move onward without going upward. A nation may easily take on the veneer of civilization and yet remain pagan or become agnostic and atheistic at heart. Modern civilization has desperate wickedness, as well as vital truths, bound up with it, and unless India gets the truth and light, plus the source of all truth, she will not have life. Automobiles and linotypes cannot save India. Christ can. For him India is hungry.

"Christ alone avails for India. India's destiny demands him. It is not a question of Krishna or Christ; it is not a question of Mohammed or Christ. It is just Christ. He fills the horizon." (India, Making and Forsaking Gods, pp. 1, 2, 9.)

India's call.—Here, then, is the situation the Methodist Episcopal Church faces in India:

A land torn by conflicting forces of such power that a new destiny is inevitable; with old faiths, old customs, old standards losing their authority; with multitudes looking for new light, new leaders; with an issue that cannot remain unsettled longer; with forces inadequate, equipment inadequate; yet with determination and faith.

The immediate need.—In view of this situation the Methodist Episcopal Church has stated as its program in India for 1925:

BURMA

ON THE ROAD TO Mandalay

Another melting pot.—Although a part of the Indian Empire, Burma is so distinct a land, racially, religiously, and socially, that it seems wise to treat it by itself. But Burma's distinctiveness is gradually disappearing before a rush of immigration much like that into Malaysia.

Burma is larger than Japan or Texas. Its population is about twice that of Illinois. The native population is made up of 7,600,000 Burmans, 996,000 Shans, 919,000 Karens, with Talaings, Chins and Kachins in lesser number. To these, however, must now be added 600,000 Indians, 108,000 Chinese, and 24,000 Europeans. And the flow of immigration has just started.

Burma's wealth.—Such immigration suggests wealth. Burma offers easy fortune to many. Famines are unknown. Crops are plentiful, with a rice surplus that makes possible an export to India and Europe of 2,750,000 tons a year. The forester finds wealth in teak. The mining engineer is beginning to develop the silver, copper, lead, iron, antimony, bismuth, tin, nitrates, salt and coal deposits.

Oil is becoming an important factor in Burmese affairs. Wells have already been drilled that produce 275,000,000 gallons a year. American drillers and production men are employed in large numbers in the development of this industry. The presence of their families adds an unusual factor to the complicated racial problem presented by Burma.

Religion in Burma.—To some extent Burma is being stirred by the same political unrest that marks the rest of British India.

There is the same revolt against a rule that leaves slight room for native responsibility. This has been most manifest in the agitation against government-controlled schools.

But it is as a religious problem that Burma challenges the Christian church. A field for Protestant effort ever since the advent of Adoniram Judson in 1813, and for Catholic workers for 200 years before that, Burma remains a land in which but slight impression has been made.

To be sure, the census of 1921 shows that, out of a population of 13,169,099, there are 257,107 Christians. But of these 178,225 are Karens, a primitive tribe with Mongolian antecedents. Only 15,381 are Burmans.

The Burman is still securely held by Buddhism. And although Buddhism in Burma has its shortcomings, it must be admitted that it has resulted in a higher degree of literacy than in any other part of the Buddhist world, with a greater freedom for women.

"When Christianity faces Burmese Buddhism, it faces one of the best speci-

BURMESE METHODISM

Centers of occupation.—Theoretically, the field of the Methodist Episcopal Church covers all Burma. Actually, the centers from which Methodist work is being conducted can be seen by reference to the map on page 76.

James M. Thoburn, as presiding elder, and John E. Robinson, as a pastor, began the Methodist work in Burma in Rangoon forty-three years ago. Their first interest was in the welfare of the Methodists who had come into the new British colony from India. Gradually, however, the work broadened until it touched many groups.

Rangoon is still the center in which the largest congregations and Methodist institutions are to be found. As the capital and leading city, this is inevitable. Fifty-five miles north of Rangoon, on the (rail)-road to Mandalay, is Pegu, a center for a village work among at least half a million people.

At Thongwa it is proposed to develop the center in which Christian workers, both men and women, shall be trained. Another village population can be reached from this city. Syriam is an oil center, with the industrial challenge that Christianity is having to meet in so many parts of the world today.

Boy Scouts, Methodist Boys' High School, Rangoon

The farthest station north of Rangoon is Thandaung, where the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has one of its best schools. And 350 miles south of Rangoon is the newest station, the seaport of Mergui, where a Chinese congregation has already been gathered. The city is 100 miles from the nearest mission station of any Protestant denomination.

Working by races.—The Burma Mission Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church is organized not geographically, but racially. That fact in itself gives an insight into the religious problem of Burma.

The Burmese district deals with the work among Burmans. This work is growing as never in the past. The annual increase in church membership is now about fifteen per cent, while the school enrolment, despite political disorders, is 1,200. With provision for adequate training for Christian workers, this feature of the work in Burma is bound to assume increasing importance.

The Indian work finds its support largely from Christians who come into the country as immigrants. Most of these are manual laborers. The Centenary has made possible the setting aside of workers especially for this field, and the results have justified the move.

The Chinese work has seemed peculiarly the portion of the Methodist mission. Especially has this been true in Rangoon. As elsewhere, the Chinese in Burma are proving the strongest elements in the business community, and their evangelization is of great importance for the future. During the Centenary there has been a large development in this feature of the work.

The English work has been among the considerable communities of English, Americans and Anglo-Indians. It is self-supporting.

Key schools.—In Rangoon, the Methodist Boys' High School and the Burmese Girls' High School rank as the peers of any schools for Burmese and Chinese children. The boys' school has enrolled more than four thousand students, with 627 at present in school. Since the student body in both schools is largely non-Christian, the work of the two hostels, with about one hundred students in each, is of great importance.

There are other schools in Rangoon, including a night school for Chinese that has proved its value over a long period of years. In Pegu, Syriam, Thandaung, and Thongwa the schools of elementary and middle grade have experienced great success.

The Women's Bible Training School at Thongwa rejoices in a new plant, from which it is expected to send out an increasing number of workers. In the same

The school for the training of preachers has been founded. The work among Indians has been placed upon a permanent basis. The station at Mergui has been opened.

In addition, the Burmese Methodist Church in Rangoon is one of the finest gifts that the Centenary has made to the work in Southern Asia. And the purchase of property in the same city provides a future center for the work among Chinese.

The immediate need.—For the work in Burma during 1925 the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved this program:

AFRICA

Methodism's first foreign field.—The first missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church to work outside the borders of the United States went to Liberia. Melville Cox did not have long to labor, but before a treacherous climate cut him down he had cried, "Let a thousand fall before Africa be given up!" That challenge Methodism can never escape.

Some mighty men have followed in Cox's footsteps.

There was Francis Burns, the first missionary bishop, who also gave his life for Liberia.

There was Bishop William Taylor, whose seven-league boots carried him through hundreds of miles of trackless jungle and planted the work of the church across Central Africa.

There was Bishop Joseph C. Hartzell, whose twenty years of leadership revived the work throughout Central Africa and inspired the church to the occupation of North Africa.

There were many others, and there are men on the field today who are the equals of those who have gone before.

The field today.—The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Africa is carried on under the French, Portuguese, Belgian, British, and Liberian flags. Although, for purposes of administration, the work in North Africa has been linked with that in Southern Europe, and is so presented in this volume, it must be kept in mind as an integral part of the African campaign. In fact, it is an immensely important part, for it represents the attempt to check Islam at the base whence the Moslem drive on Central Africa is launched.

The Methodist field is thus seen to be, in North Africa: Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Tripoli, and the island of Madeira; in West Africa: Liberia, and Angola; in Central Africa: Rhodesia, and the Belgian Congo; in Southeast Africa: Mozambique and the Union of South Africa.

The best account of this work is to be found in Methodist Trails in the African Jungle, by Marjorie Barstow. Anyone familiar with that will recognize in this volume material from that source.

Common problems and methods.—Much of the work in Central Africa deals with problems common to all primitive communities, without reference to boundary lines. A description of general methods in Angola, the Congo, Rhodesia, and Mozambique would show slight variations between any of the missions.

For this reason it has seemed best to include, under the description of the work in Angola, a general section entitled, "Christian Missions in Africa." Readers of the portions assigned to the Congo, Rhodesia, and Mozambique are asked to keep this section of the Angola write-up in mind.

A continental program.—With the coming of the railway and the automobile road, a Christian campaign can be projected into Africa upon a scale that would have been impossible a few years ago. For this reason, the Methodist Episcopal Church secures episcopal supervision for this enormous field south of the Sahara with only two episcopal residences, one in Monrovia and one in Capetown.

It is felt that the immediate need calls for a program of religious education that will also be continental in scope. For this purpose the Methodist Episcopal Church, in addition to the budgets for the several missions, has approved the following program for Africa as a whole, to be carried out during 1925:

LIBERIA

METHODISM'S FIRST MISSION

Another Centenary.—The Republic of Liberia has just been celebrating its centenary. While present world conditions cast a shadow across the anniversary, still there has been sufficient cause for rejoicing.

Brought by the American Colonization Society in 1820 to the west coast of Africa, the first settlers in Liberia, as one writer said, "huddled on this little strip of cleared ground, with the tangled, dripping gloom of the tropical forest rising like a wall around them, and in front of them only the misty void where the gray sheets of rain lashed the sea into steam, and the breakers boomed on the shore. The first Pilgrim winter on the rock-bound coast of New England was not so heroic an experience as the first rainy season which the founders of this free state faced on the edge of the jungle."

When the forces of climate, savagery, and the jungle failed to wipe out the political experiment launched by freed slaves from America, the government of Liberia, therefore, considered a centenary celebration in order.

Where the church has been planted.—The history of the Republic of Liberia has been closely bound up with that of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The first Methodist congregation was formed among the emigrants on the first boat to land at what is now Monrovia. The first missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church to leave the United States sailed for Liberia. Melville Cox was the first Methodist missionary to die in a foreign land. His challenge, "Let thousands fall before Africa be given up," remains as one of the watchwords of Christian missions.

The government of Liberia has never proved strong enough to do more than colonize a thin strip of territory along its coast, nor has the church yet penetrated to regions where the authority of the Republic has not been recognized. Mission stations have been located in Monrovia, Grand Bassa, Nanah Kru, Jacktown, Garraway, Harper, Sinoe, and Wissika. Most of these, it will be seen, are on the seashore, the others being on important rivers.

Fifty-nine schools of various grades are located in these central stations and scattered through villages near by, with more than 3,000 enrolled students. But ten of these students, in the College of West Africa, are doing work of high-school grade.

Problems and opportunities.—A great proportion of the inhabitants of civilized Liberia claim to be Christians. Among these are to be numbered the 9,000 enrolled in the baptized constituency of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

But the isolation of this community from the rest of the Christian world has been so great that in the course of its century of history a gradual deterioration has taken place. Today ninety per cent of the church membership in Liberia is uneducated. The tendency on the part of many is toward a lower rather than a higher standard of living.

The first problem that confronts the church is, therefore, a lifting of the whole plane of life of the present community. This is closely connected with the restoration of political vigor to Liberia. Without a higher type of Christian community the republic cannot command the sort of citizenship that a successful democracy requires.

A second need is found in the call from the 2,000,000 uncivilized pagans who inhabit four-fifths of the territory of Liberia. Theoretically these are subject to the Liberian government, and their chiefs hold commissions from the President of the Republic. Actually, they and their chiefs do as they please.

The stations at Jacktown and Wissika may prove centers from which this work can be undertaken. Practically all indications point to it as the most promising field for future service in Liberia.

A further problem, however, is raised when once the savage has been reached. Life in the civilized portions of Liberia is so primitive that there is almost nothing for the native to do, after he has been given a modern education. The church, therefore, finds itself under the necessity of developing certain industries and handicrafts. For this reason much of the educational work must be in the nature of industrial training.

NEXT STEPS IN LIBERIA

An educated constituency.—In addition to fifty-four day schools, the Methodist Episcopal Church conducts an academy at Cape Palmas, an industrial school at White Plains on the St. Paul River, another industrial school at Sinoe on the Sinoe River, a school for the training of preachers, and the College of West Africa at Monrovia.

Monrovia is a pretty little town which looks like a cross between a metropolis and a pasture. Here are located the government buildings, the state college of Liberia, the College of West Africa, fronting lawn-like streets completely covered with turf, where cattle wander up and down and peacefully graze among the passersby. At the end of some of these streets the forest rises like a green wall.

Among the buildings of Monrovia stands the College of West Africa, showing the signs of seventy-eight years of service. The ants have eaten the beams of the building until, in every tropical storm, they threaten to fall upon the heads of the 294 students who are gathered in its ancient rooms. These rooms are so few that classes must meet before breakfast, at noon, and after school hours. The first move in the rehabilitation of Liberia must be the provision of a suitable plant for this College of West Africa.

In the southeast corner of the Republic, at Harper, in Cape Palmas county, there is another old school. This, likewise, is in sad need of repair. One hundred and ninety-four students, most of them from jungle kraals, a few from Liberian Christian homes, are studying here. More equipment must be forthcoming for them.

The St. Paul River Industrial Institute, established by Bishop Hartzell, is to be provided with the equipment that it must have in order to do the work for which it has been intended. The Sinoe River Industrial Institute is likewise to have its equipment enlarged.

A dozen new village day schools are to be opened.

Penetrating the jungle.—The policy of the Methodist Episcopal Church is to enter immediately upon the evangelization of the pagan tribes of interior Liberia. While schools and churches in the civilized coastal region must be brought to a higher state of development, the occupation of that part of the country can be said to be fairly complete. It remains now to move into the jungle, where Methodism must shoulder the responsibility for reaching practically all of the 2,000,000 tribesmen. Thus it happens that the World Service program calls for further pioneer advance in the Methodist mission field that has been longest occupied. Negro churches in America are expected to have a large part in making this forward movement possible. Missionary recruits from Negro colleges are offering themselves as rapidly as opportunities for African service open.

Help toward this enterprise is being extended by the American Bible Society, which has always shown a deep interest in the work in Liberia. The gospel according to St. Mark has already been printed in K'Pelle, one of the native languages, thus providing a necessary basis for permanent advance.

The immediate need.—Facing the requirements of the congregations already planted and the evangelization of the untouched tribes of the interior, the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved the following program for Liberia in 1925:

ANGOLA

THE WESTERN END OF THE METHODIST LINE

Bishop Taylor's vision.—When William Taylor landed in Africa as a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he saw the same Islamic menace that immediately strikes every Christian observer who visits that continent. By every caravan route Moslem traders and slave dealers were pressing from North Africa to the conquest of the pagan jungle. Ten converts were being won to the prophet of Mecca for every one that was being brought into the Christian fold. Bishop Taylor's instant decision called upon the church to throw a line of mission stations across the continent to help in holding back the Moslem invasion.

Take the map of Africa and locate the Methodist stations on it. It will be seen that, while the church has never supported this work in a measure sufficient to make the Christian rampart strong, there is at least the beginning of an occupation stretching from Loanda on the Atlantic to Inhambane on the Pacific. Angola thus affords the western anchor of the Methodist line across Africa.

Liberia, it is true, is farther west, but Liberia is a problem by itself, and is hardly to be considered as a part of the campaign for the Christian conquest of central Africa. It is in Angola that the visitor, penetrating the country from the west coast, first sees the distinctive work that has been evolved for the Christianization of the people of the jungle.

Angola—a land of promise. — Angola, the Portuguese province in West Africa, is one of the largest political divisions of Africa, and potentially one of the richest. From the steaming swamps and foam-flecked sands of the coast the land rises through a district of wooded mountains and flowery valleys with here and there a sandy stretch, slime swamps, and aimless rivers — to wide, wind-swept plateaus, where the grass grows higher than a man's head, and is weighted down in the morning by dews as heavy as rain.

Despite large mineral deposits and arable land, Angola remains only potentially rich. The Portuguese government has not proved equal to any large development of natural resources. The slave trade, until its abolition a few years ago, provided almost the only source of wealth. Almost no provision has been made to protect the country against periodic famine, although it would be comparatively easy by irrigation and the storing of foods to guard against the present decrease in population.

British capital, working in Southern Angola, has helped to bring about a fairly rapid development but, as a whole, this great province with its 480,000 square miles of territory awaits the sort of development that will make it comparable with the African colonies of other European powers.

Under Portuguese rule.—The change from a monarchy to a republic in Portugal has brought about some improvement in the administration of Angola. A railroad now penetrates from Loanda as far inland as Malange, a distance of approximately 218 miles. It will one day be pushed across the Belgian Congo until it links up with the Cape-to-Cairo railway and its subsidiaries.

Under the republican government slavery has been abolished, polygamy discouraged, and distilling prohibited. Increase is to be seen in the wages paid native laborers in practically all Portuguese centers of occupation, although this increase has not kept pace with the rise in the cost of living. But while advance must be noted, much remains to be done before the Portuguese colonial service reaches the standards set by other governments.

Recently, in an attempt to insure the stability of Portuguese rule, it has been ordered that no school can be conducted in any other than the Portuguese language, and that nothing can be printed in the native dialects except in parallel columns with Portuguese, a method that has been followed only by the Roman Catholic missions previously. Public meetings, conducted in other than Portuguese, have in some places been prohibited, and Christian preaching, except in that language, has been interfered with.

At the present time, according to some reports, the colonial government in Angola is seriously hindering the spread of the gospel. Protestant missions are taking such steps as are possible to bring their work into conformity with government requirements.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS IN AFRICA¹

The problem of Africa—The circumstances with which the missionary must deal in Angola do not differ materially from those in the Congo, Rhodesia, or Portuguese East Africa. It is possible, therefore, in this connection to outline in general the problems that must be solved in all this region.

There is first of all, the problem of savagery. It is the same problem that has confronted every missionary since the time of Robert Moffatt. There are, including the Bantus, about 120,000,000 Negroes in Africa, most of whom still live in a condition of primitive savageness. The primitive Negro, as has been stated, has never founded a stone city, nor built a ship, nor produced a literature, nor suggested a creed. The social order in the native kraal has been exceedingly simple. Any development of the enormous resources of Africa carries with it a complete overturning of all this life of the past.

The entrance of western industry, typified by the mine or the railway, is being marked by an almost complete disarrangement of indigenous social and political structures. It is the task of the Christian to see that this does not finally land the native in a condition worse than was his in the jungle days.

The advent of the white man and Moslem has produced a second problem in the form of slavery. The work of such Christian pioneers as Livingstone moved the Women water-carriers, Angola

European powers to declare against the African slave traffic, and great credit must be given them for the resolute way in which they have attempted the healing of "Africa's open sore." But, while formal slavery has largely been abolished, there have been types of forced labor that have been little better than slavery. In a colony like Angola this persists. Its presence makes exceedingly difficult the work of any evangelist who would attempt to tell men to hold up their heads as the equals of all other sons of God.

The whole life of Africa is scourged by ignorance and disease. The one leads naturally to the other. The population of equatorial Africa is smaller today than it was fifty years ago. Observers have pointed out that one result of the establishment of an enlightened colonial administration by European powers is a rapid increase in black population, making the racial question more difficult of solution. Ignorance has driven the African to employ the witch doctor who, with his incantations and atrocious physical practices, has increased the sorrows of Africa many fold. Every epidemic known to other parts of the world, with some peculiar to Africa, flourishes in this continent. Until the understanding of the natives is enlarged, hope can not be held either for their physical well being or their power to grapple with the new con-

Finally, the missionary faces an appalling religious problem. The paganism of the African native is of as brutalizing a type as is to be found. It is a question whether the African presents to the Christian worker a more difficult problem as a pagan or as a converted Mohammedan. With Mohammedanism increasing at its present rate, many Christians have come to feel that the ultimate struggle is hardly to be between Christianity and paganism. African paganism has shown little power to maintain itself in the face of Christian effort and the ultimate struggle must, therefore, be between Christianity and Islam.

Methods of mission work. — Facing conditions such as these, it will be clear why the effort of Protestant forces in Africa is largely devoted to these types of work:

Industrial missions, in which natives receive training in modern agricultural and other industrial processes. This means that they are prepared to take their places as self-supporting members of the new African communities. When to the industrial training is added a Christian experience, these leaders bring to their responsible positions in society a Christian testimony that is of incalculable value.

Medical missions form an unequalled mode of approach to the confidence of the native. By superseding the power of the witch doctor they strike at the heart of paganism, and by ministering to the suffering of all who come, they show Christianity to possess a care for others such as Mohammedanism gives no indication of having.

Educational missions are necessary, not only to open the minds of the comparatively few students who can be gathered in the schools, but to send them back as teachers and preachers among their own people. Missionary work over all of Africa is marked by the number of outstations opened by these trained native workers. No permanent Christian communities can be obtained without giving large scope to the work of educational missions.

The use of literature is recognized as of increasing importance. The missionaries have been largely responsible for the reduction of scores of native languages to writing. Now the new generation is being taught to read, it is possible to make practically the whole literature of Africa for a century Christian literature. The influence of this upon the future of the continent can be seen to be beyond calculation.

Finally, there must be preaching of the gospel by missionaries and converts who have been provided with Christian education. This is the foundation upon which all else rests. Whether the worker, missionary or African, is appointed to educational, medical, or industrial work, he feels his responsibility as an evangelist, and adds his effort wherever possible to that of those immediately commissioned to that task.

Islam vs. Christianity in Africa

Modern farm methods penetrate Africa

THE METHODIST OCCUPATION OF ANGOLA

That hilltop at Loanda.—On a plateau overlooking the Atlantic the Methodist Episcopal Church has built one of its most complete mission stations in the city of Loanda, the capital of Angola.

Here is a school for boys and girls, a dispensary and hospital for children of both sexes—blacks, whites, and mulattoes—and from it go out graduates to conduct work in the interior.

A few years ago there was sent out from Loanda a young convert to open work on the banks of the Aranga River. He cleared the land, planted trees, built a native house and then a native church and soon had a prosperous work under way. After a time he married an assistant teacher in the Loanda school. The two have developed a village church and school of such a high grade that the High Commissioner of Angola has written in praise of their services.

Other stations.—Inland from Loanda by railroad, beyond the arid and hot belt and again beyond the densely forested hills and valleys, lies the high open plateau. Here, south of the railroad another two days' journey, is Quiongua. The mission here has timber land and a well-equipped farm, totaling about 10,000 acres. An extensive industrial work furnishes the foundation for a future Christian community of large influence.

At the inland terminus of the railroad is Malanje, a government post of considerable importance. From here the trails strike out in all directions to the interior. Like the work in Loanda, that in Malanje was closed for years but was reopened under the inspiration of Bishop Hartzell and is today being developed as a station in such a center should be.

Six miles away, at Quessua, is a farm of 8,900 acres which is destined to be the outstanding example of Christian agricultural missions in Angola. While this work is scarcely under way yet, under the direction of a trained agriculturalist and with the proper implements it is hoped to bring this station quickly to a position approximating self-support. A well-developed work for the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, including a boarding school, medical clinic, and village evangelization, is also located here.

THE BELGIAN CONGO

THE CENTER OF THE LINE

The wealth of the Congo.—One of America's most authoritative writers on geographical subjects has said that the history of European colonial expansion in Africa is the history of a struggle for raw materials—fibers, oils, hides, minerals, rubber. (Cf. Isaiah Bowman, The New World.) Nowhere has this struggle been more bitterly carried on than in the Congo and, by the same token, nowhere have the native tribes had greater cause to bemoan the coming of the white man than in this portion of Central Africa.

The initial stages of exploitation have passed in the Congo, but it can not be said that more than the surface deposits of copper, gold, tin, diamonds, coal and uranium have been touched. The coming of a modern industrialism which is largely under British rule has had here the familiar effect of thoroughly upsetting all the old life of the natives.

Into this district Europeans, Mohammedans, and pagans from the four corners of Africa are now entering. Negro labor is being exploited on a grand scale. The result is something that makes a native kraal look like paradise. Thus the problem of the missionary in the Congo is not only that of dealing with the ancient paganism and its jungle background but also that of dealing with an unprepared horde of bewildered people thrust suddenly into an utterly alien environment.

Under the Belgian flag.—The history of the Congo does not make comfortable reading. The scene for years of intrigue and struggle on the part of western powers, it was made a nominally independent state in 1885 under the sovereignty of Leopold II, king of the Belgians. Leopold proved to be a business man in whose eyes profits from the production of rubber were of more value than many natives.

Conditions in the Congo became so scandalous that there finally burst forth an outcry from all parts of the Christian world. In bringing these conditions to the light, the Christian missionaries played a leading part. In fact Richard Harding Davis testified at the time: "In the Congo almost the only people who are working in behalf of the natives are those attached to the missions... It is due to them that Europe and the United States know the truth about the Congo. They were the first to bear witness, and the hazardous work they still are doing for their fellow men is honest, practical Christianity."

In 1908 the Congo was finally annexed to Belgium. Since then there has been rapid improvement. The colonial administration is now fit to be considered with that in any other part of Central Africa. Representatives of British and American societies working in the Congo, meeting in 1921, sent a message to the King and Queen of the Belgians in which they rendered their "grateful acknowledgment of the progress which is being made under the Belgian Colonial Administration. In the measures which affect the well being and advancement of your Majesties' Congo native subjects, the deep personal interest which it is well known your Majesties take in the amelioration of the native social positions, the arrest of the ravages of disease and the education of the people is an inspiring example."

The problem in human terms.—But with all that the colonial administration can do, the condition of the Congo today presents an appalling human problem. With the white man's industry have come the white man's vices. Social diseases are putting their mark deeply into the bodies of the natives. Intemperance is mounting at a rapid rate. Nothing seems to avail for the safeguarding of the Negro under these conditions save that intimate and special interest in the souls of black men which only the missionary is prepared to practice.

Yet, when one looks at the map and calculates what our so-called missionary "occupation" means in terms of days of travel separating the stations, one sees how far the church is still from anything like an adequate response to the needs of the two and a half million people scattered through the villages of the Belgian Congo. In all conscience, this work has hardly begun.

The raw stuff of humanity

METHODIST WORK IN THE CONGO

Elisabethville—key city.—The main mission stations of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Belgian Congo are Elisabethville, Kambove, Kabongo, and Katanga. Recent observers have named Elisabethville as one of the three strategic centers for all Africa. Located 2,300 miles from Cape Town on the Cape-to-Cairo railway, a provincial capital, a divisional railway headquarters, a commercial center, the site of a great copper smelting plant, the city has grown from an uninhabited spot in the jungle to a modern municipality with electric lights, a powerful wireless station and other western improvements since 1912.

In Elisabethville the church faces the many problems of the African native employed in modern industry. Practically all of the Negroes in the city work in the copper smelter. Here they receive wages which give them purchasing power far beyond any that they have known in the past. Likewise, they have leisure. A combination of the two—money and time in which to spend it—frequently brings moral disaster.

If the Methodist Episcopal Church is adequately to deal with such a situation as this and to put an imprint of a positive

Protestantism upon this key city of Central Africa, it must develop a modern type of institutional evangelism. It has been proven again and again that the natives will respond to advance of this nature. But while we are content to maintain a single missionary family in such a strategic point, we can hardly persuade ourselves, let alone others, that we are in earnest in our expressed determination to evangelize Africa.

Other stations.—A hundred miles northwest of Elisabethville on the railroad is Kambove, where the church conducts its Bible training school and the Congo Mission Press. Both are indispensable factors in the African missionary enterprise.

Sixteen miles southeast of Kambove is the copper mining center of Likasi with a uranium mine. This is destined to become the greatest industrial center of the Congo and should soon be entered.

Mussoni, a gold, copper and tin mining center on the Lualaba, one of the head waters of the Congo River, also invites entrance.

The scattered nature of Methodist work in the Congo is emphasized when one makes the twenty-eight days' journey from Elisabethville through the jungle 400 miles north to Kabongo. Medical work has, during the Centenary period, been added to the other work at this station, the influence of which is constantly spreading to all the territory near by.

Reaching the railway head at Kambove, the Methodist pioneers, Rev. and Mrs. John M. Springer, pressed 450 miles northwest to Kapinga where another station that is doing a well-rounded type of work has been developed.

It is expected that a further station will be located at Sandoa but, until forces are available, this advance is hardly practicable.

The student of missions, therefore, who studies the map of the Congo, sees that the Methodist Episcopal Church, while undertaking sole Protestant responsibility for a territory more than four hundred miles square, has so far been able to plant only three or four isolated stations in widely separated corners of this great area. It must now move forward to fill in the unevangelized regions or it must give up all pretext of dealing with the demands of the situation.

The immediate need.—During 1925 the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved the following program for the Belgian Congo:

RHODESIA

UNDER THE BRITISH FLAG

Part of Cecil Rhodes' legacy.—Passing south and east from the Belgian Congo, the traveler entering southern Rhodesia finds himself in an African mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church conducted under the British flag. The center of the work is largely in Old Umtali, ten miles from the city of Umtali, near the border of Portuguese East Africa.

In the days when Cecil Rhodes was building into reality his dream of empire in Africa, there came a time when he determined that the four year old city of Umtali should be deserted and another with the same name, be built on the present site. To many it seemed mistaken policy to abandon the already developed town. "What can be done with it?" they asked. "Make a mission of it," replied Rhodes. So a mission it became.

The whole town was turned over to Bishop Hartzell. The jail became a school, the court a hospital, stores became residences, office buildings dormitories, the straight unshaded streets gave place to winding roads and trees and flowers were encouraged to grow in profusion.

So it can be said that just as Cecil Rhodes' dream gave Rhodesia to the British Empire, it likewise gave Old Umtali to the Methodist Episcopal Church. Here has grown the most highly developed institutional and agricultural mission conducted by our church in Africa.

The mission campus at Old Umtali

Cross-currents in Rhodesia.—Rhodesia, which for administrative purposes is divided into northern and southern Rhodesia, is under the administration of the British South Africa Company, which holds a charter much like those once held by the companies that developed India and North America for the British crown.

The region south of the Zambezi River is known as Southern Rhodesia. In its 149,000 square miles 37,000 whites seek to rule 770,000 Negroes. Land is owned by the company. Negroes have been dispossessed and gathered into native reserves, much as the Indians of the United States have been placed upon reservations. At present the company is attempting to bring in large numbers of veterans of the World War. Because of its high elevation, Rhodesia is known as a "white man's land" and agriculture and stock raising have proved a source of profit for many immigrants.

There is much agitation concerning the political future of the colony. A year ago an election was held in which the colonists voted against inclusion in the Union of South Africa. Many of the business interests favor a retention of the present status. The proposal has been made that the colony be erected into a crown colony, like Nigeria, or that it be given autonomy, like Newfoundland. Agitation is increasing so that some solution of these political problems must be achieved within a few years.

Supporting the missionary.—It is not likely that any change in government will bring a change in attitude toward the missionary. From the days of Cecil Rhodes the intelligent colonist has recognized in the missionary the most successful agent in accommodating the native to changing industrial conditions. The practical result of this support can be seen in the fact that 14,800 acres of land in various parts of Rhodesia have been given to the Methodist Episcopal Church as a basis for its work. The attitude of the political and educational officials is almost uniformly that of complete support.

TRAINING HAND WHILE CHANGING HEART

The romance of Old Umtali.—“Make a mission of it,” cried Cecil Rhodes. What a mission it has become!

Sixteen missionaries here conduct schools, a theological seminary, a mission press, a dispensary and maternity hospital, as well as an agricultural experiment station. At the present time there are thirty-five embryo teachers in training here, forty future leaders in native agriculture, twenty preachers in the making.

Many a traveler, appalled at the lack of development in most of Central Africa, has come to Old Umtali to have his faith renewed by this living proof of what consecration and a varied application of Christian truth can do in bringing transformation.

Coupled with Old Umtali are three other large stations as the head of a circuit spreading out over many miles. One of these is at Nyakatsapa, one at Headlands, and one at Gandanzara.

Other work in Rhodesia.—In Umtali there is a work among the large European population with another circuit ministering to natives. Umtali is the present government center, located on a branch connected with the Cape-to-Cairo railroad, and is bound to be of increasing influence. No program for a strong work in the part of Rhodesia that the Methodist Episcopal Church occupies can neglect the development of this center.

Fifty miles south lies Mutambara. Here a strong industrial and educational work is being developed. The government inspector of schools reported last year: “At no mission in Rhodesia have I seen such rapid and sound progress as has taken place at this mission during the last two years. Not long ago there were forty to fifty pupils receiving a little instruction in reading and writing with practically no industrial training. Now there are 283 pupils attending fairly regularly and the organization throughout is sound.” The work at Mutambara represents one of the largest advances in Africa during the Centenary period.

Sixty miles from Salisbury, the capital of Rhodesia, in the native reserve of Mrewa, there is an evangelistic and medical work in the town of that name. Forty miles farther northeast in the reserve of Mtoko there is also work. The two towns form the stations for the Mrewa district where, in an area of 6,000 square miles, the Methodist Episcopal Church is responsible for the evangelization of 55,000 people.

The movement toward Christianity has set in very strongly in this region and the latest report states that "it is not too much to expect a Christian following of from 15,000 to 20,000 in this district within a few years."

The immediate need.—When compared with some other African fields, such as that in the Belgian Congo, it will be seen that the territory for which the Methodist Episcopal Church is responsible in Southern Rhodesia is fairly compact. Despite this fact and the advances made during the Centenary period, it can not yet be said to be adequately occupied. For this reason the Methodist Episcopal Church has authorized the following program for work in Rhodesia during 1925:

MOZAMBIQUE

(Portuguese East Africa)

THE EASTERN END OF THE METHODIST LINE

Another Portuguese colony.—Columbus and the Spaniards sailed west, but before they found a New World the Portuguese by sailing south—down past Madeira, down past Cape Verde, around the Cape of Good Hope and then up the east coast of Africa—planted that colony that survives to this day. Mozambique (more commonly called Portuguese East Africa) is one of the oldest European colonies in the world.

Portuguese rule has never been progressive. Nor, it must be admitted, has this colony held out the lures that have brought development to other parts of Africa. Much of the land is low and swampy. There are few mineral deposits of great value. The people are not of a high mental type. Good harbors are few and the trade routes to the interior infrequent.

A region economically evangelized.—"Africa, south of the Zambesi," said an American observer recently, "is evangelized, economically speaking." By that he meant that the word has been taken to every kraal and village of the coming of the white man's industry to the mines of the Transvaal, and of the high wages to be earned there. As a result, there is scarcely a native man between twenty and thirty years of age to be found in this region who has not at some time worked in or near Johannesburg.

The way in which the good news of high wages has penetrated the jungles of South-east Africa shows that it is not impossible within a generation, to carry a message to these people sometimes considered inaccessible. But there is a basis for deep thought in the fact that the message of the mines, with its inevitable danger, has made so much more rapid progress than the message of the gospel. The Christian church needs to ask itself whether it is actually as much in earnest about reaching these people as the companies who need laborers in their mines.

In no part of Africa is there a more difficult and varied religious problem with which to cope. "Here the traveler may find traces of various religions," writes Miss Barstow. "There are the altars erected to the various jungle spirits. The traveler in Chopi land, for instance, often comes upon as many as eight altars within a mile. A piece of cloth has been tied to a tree; the brush and weeds have been cleared away; and upon a small mound has been placed a piece of flesh, some blood, a dish, fruit, beads, and the like. There are also Mohammedan mosques; and here and there a Catholic cross or image of the suffering Jesus.

"But there are also those outdoor meetings of the native converts, which fill so many touching and picturesque paragraphs in our missionaries' letters. All the storied pomp of stained glass windows and old churches cannot equal the impressiveness of the camp-fire meeting in Inhambane beneath the white African moon. The ruddy glow of the camp-fire lights up the white teeth, brass bangles and eager faces of the black people gathered around the missionary to hear the new message. The solemn words seem more solemn against the background of the silent woods, where the moonlight sifting through the trees, turns the palms to silver. And then, in the stillness, the plaintive voices of the black Christians are lifted in the strains of 'Abide with Me, Fast Falls the Eventide,' or 'Holy Night, Silent Night,' hour after hour they will sing till the music seems to fill the moonlit space and 'mount up beyond the stars to the very throne of God.'"

The presence of Mohammedanism in Mozambique is not to be connected with the present grand push of Islam through the heart of Central Africa. Moslem traders came to the ports of the east coast of Africa almost as soon as European adventurers opened those ports and connected them with India. The mosques have been found in the port cities ever since. At the present time the large Mohammedan population is not increasing greatly.

The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church is confined to that part of Mozambique lying between the Sabi and Limpopo rivers, stretching from the coast inland to the border of the Transvaal. It is organized as the Inhambane District of the Southeast Africa Mission Conference.

HEALING BODIES AND SOULS

A medical ministry to millions.—Directly across the bay from the city of Inhambane, on a high bluff in the town of Gikuki, stands the Inhambane Hospital, an institution of mercy that is known throughout all Southeast Africa. With the exception of the dispensary at Kamhini, thirty miles inland, and a government hospital at Inhambane that does not care for natives, this is the only ministry of its kind for 2,500,000 people.

The staff consists of a single doctor, two nurses furnished by the Methodist Episcopal Church and one by the Free Methodist Church, five native assistants, and twelve nurses in training. Although the hospital contains but ten beds, last year it cared for 750 in-patients; 18,000 out-patients; 426 operations were performed; 460 outside calls were made; 206 obstetrical cases were handled. An analysis shows a varied type of medical work, but especial attention has to be given to tuberculosis, leprosy, and bilharzia, all of which make frightful inroads in this region.

Evangelism goes hand in hand with healing. A Christian service opens every day's work at the hospital, and the Bible woman labors individually with the patients throughout the day. Bible verses are pasted on every bottle of medicine dispensed. And when some member of a Christian family falls sick, and pagan relatives or friends urge the calling in of the witch doctor, the Christian physician then comes to hold faith steady.

The response to the work of the Inhambane Hospital has been so great as to be embarrassing. Tubercular and leprous natives present an especially pitiable appeal, for there is almost no way of caring for them, and in most cases they must, out of consideration for the other patients, be sent away. Rapidly as the work has expanded during the Centenary period, this further expansion, to provide proper isolation and care for cases of this kind, is urgently needed.

Africa's gratitude.—The way in which the native feels about such service as is being rendered at the Inhambane Hospital is graphically expressed in a letter received by the Board of Foreign Missions:

"This doctor we call him in our native converse 'Nenguelisam,' that means interpret, 'Maker of people to be glad.' Oh, this marvelously doctor! Why? Look at the people; these did have great sick which we could not hope that these people will be healed. But now are getting well. Is he not marvelously doctor? He is doctor of hearts, too. He makes happy the unjoy heart and makes more tenderness the durable hearts. He is a friend of babies, children, men, women, white people, and he is friend of all people of black. If he finds us at food he take the spoon and eat with us the food of our black people. Therefore I make you know that let you not fatigue to help this make-glad doctor Stauffacher."

Other Methodist work in Mozambique.—At Gikuki and Kambini there are training schools in which native pastors, selected from the out-station schools, pass through a course that includes the Bible, the history of the church, and the lives of Wesley, of Livingstone, and of Mohammed. The schools for girls, conducted by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, place stress upon the household arts.

There is the beginning of an agricultural mission at Kambini on the farm of 1,200 acres, and the Inhambane Press, located at the same station, finds its editions grown from 500 to 25,000 with no possibility of keeping pace with the demand. A commentary, this, upon the increase in literacy among Christians.

There is also a station planted at Manjacaze, forty-five miles from Chai-chai, on the railway running north.

From all the central stations there radiate a large number of out-stations. There are more than one hundred of these out-station schools in Portuguese East Africa, with 3,173 children in them. The baptized Christian community includes about six thousand persons, but a much larger number are under constant spiritual care.

The immediate need.—It is impossible to separate the budget for the work in Mozambique from that for the work in the Transvaal, for both are parts of one conference. In caring for the needs of that conference missionaries cannot always pause to consider boundary lines.

Bearing that in mind, it has been the judgment of the Methodist Episcopal Church that, during 1925, the work in Southeast Africa, including both Mozambique and the Transvaal, should be on this basis:

THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

(The Transvaal)

THE LURE OF THE MINES

Johannesburg.—It is the lure of the mines that is drawing the men of Central Africa into the Transvaal. Just how many diamonds or how much gold and coal will be dug out before the soil is exhausted cannot be calculated. But long before that time the flow of laborers back and forth, from the mines to all the villages south of the Zambezi, will have revolutionized at least a third of Africa.

History tells how sinister a role the mines in and about Johannesburg have played. In years past their social influence was almost as bad as their economic. Africa seemed to be overrun with black men, and the whites who were developing the mines felt no compunction over wasting Negro life. Forced labor was common; hygienic conditions in and about the mines took a frightful toll.

This is no longer true, at least in the better mines. The companies have come to see the value of a life, even when it is the life of only a bush Negro. Healthy, contented workmen are a better investment than diseased, resentful employees. Any effort to safeguard and benefit the natives in the mines of the Rand now meets with the enthusiastic support of the employing mining companies.

A primitive sort of meal, but satisfying—
All eating from one bowl

Following the convert.—Common labor at the mines of the Transvaal is done almost exclusively by Negroes imported from Portuguese East Africa and Rhodesia. The employment agents press far into the jungles, with their promise of large pay. Men who have worked at Johannesburg return to their kraals with trunks bulging—umbrella, walking stick, frying pan, enamel wash bowl, bucket, folding chair, multi-colored vest, coat, hat, shoes, collar, necktie, shirts, comb, mirror, hair brush, soap, vaseline, beads, brooch, waists, dresses, "and other articles too numerous to mention." Between the two, the urge becomes so strong that practically every able-bodied young man makes the journey of hundreds of miles to the mines.

In this group go Christians as well as pagans. In fact, the companies encourage the coming of Christians, having found them to be most dependable workers. But the same sort of temptations lie in wait for these Negroes that beset the path of men away from home in other parts of the world. Unless they are safeguarded their period in the Transvaal may prove their religious and physical ruin.

It is for this reason that the Methodist Episcopal Church finds itself at work in the Union of South Africa. There are many missionary societies in the country, especially those of British and Dutch origin. They do good work. Why, then, has the Methodist Episcopal Church, during the Centenary period, extended its work here as well? Simply to care for the thousands of converts who come down, every year, from Portuguese East Africa into this strange environment. Friendless, talking a strange dialect, these converts cannot be left at the mercy of the sharks who surround the mines.

Types of work.—The mining companies house their laborers in compounds, which consist of simple dormitories surrounded by walls. As many as 7,000 Negroes live in a single one of these dormitories. The hours of labor are not excessively long, so that much of the time is spent lounging about the compound or, when permission can be obtained, whiling away time outside. The laborer's time may thus become his undoing, or, properly used, it may increase his value to society enormously.

In sixty-three such compounds in and about Johannesburg the Methodist Episcopal Church has work. Here, with the encouragement of the companies, rooms have been opened in which evangelistic and educational work is conducted. Two school sessions are held daily, as well as a prayer service, and on Sundays there are the regular services of the church. The teaching is done in the native dialects of the supervising missionary, self-supporting. This they gladly do. After their period of service at the mines has expired, many of these "Johannesburg men" become outstanding leaders in the church in Portuguese East Africa.

The immediate need.—There are still scores of compounds containing Methodists where it has been impossible for the church to extend its work. In many of the compounds there is an inescapable obligation resting upon the church to broaden its program. Lives influenced here will tell for Christ over many hundred miles of Africa. The church must see that this work, so auspiciously begun, is properly carried ahead.

The approved budget for work in the Transvaal during 1925 is included with that printed in the section devoted to Mozambique. Since that work is all part of one conference—the Southeast Africa Mission Conference—it is impossible to divide it by geographical lines.

Black folk gathered to hear the missionary preach in a compound, Johannesburg

Distribution of Methodist Episcopal churches in Latin America

GANTE CHURCH, MEXICO CITY

In all material matters, as well as in matters more spiritual, South America is today pre-eminently the continent of opportunity.

FRANCIS E. CLARK

LATIN AMERICA

The task of bringing a living Christ to the solution of the problems of the Latin world is one of the most difficult confronting the church. The Christian rejoices, however, that at last Protestantism is facing this need with a unity, determination and wisdom unknown in the past.

THE FIELD

To the Methodist Episcopal Church has been assigned an honorable part in the evangelization of Latin America: Our lines run from the Rio Grande on the north to the Straits of Magellan on the south.

Mexico, Costa Rica, Panama, Peru, Bolivia, Chile, Argentina and Uruguay—this is the present Latin American field of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

In none of these countries is there any overlapping with the work of the other evangelical bodies who have formed the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America. United advance is the slogan.

A UNIFIED WORK

Increasingly the Latin American effort of the Methodist Episcopal Church is becoming unified. The two bishops work in closest harmony, and the problems of Santiago are considered in the light of experience gained in Puebla.

From the episcopal headquarters in the City of Mexico the work in Mexico, Costa Rica, Panama and Peru is administered.

From Buenos Aires supervision is given to Argentina, Uruguay, Chile and Bolivia.

These are two of the largest episcopal areas in Methodism both in size and in terms of the time required to cover them.

Continental secretaries.—With the advanced program made possible by the Centenary, there has come a requirement for leaders for specialized lines of effort. Three secretaries are accordingly at work.

The Rev. Hugh C. Stuntz has been notably successful in raising the standards of Sunday-school work. In the religious culture of children lies the great hope for the future power of evangelism in Latin lands.

The Rev. Paul Barnhart is bearing a notable part in the temperance campaigns that are now fighting the alcoholism that so menaces South America's future. Government education departments have gone so far as to ask him to prepare texts for use in public schools.

The Rev. S. P. Hauser has given direction to the increasing activities of the Epworth Leagues.

In addition to these, the Rev. George A. Miller was appointed executive secretary of the Centenary movement for the continent, and the remarkable increase in self-support and in membership testify to the enthusiasm with which that work has been pushed.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, as a member of the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America, benefits from the employment of an educational secretary.

MAIN LINES OF ADVANCE

The basic problems of the Latin American countries are much the same. The Methodist Episcopal Church in these eight republics plans six lines of advance.

Trained leadership.—This comes first everywhere. The ministry has suffered through failing to attract men who had little more than warmth of spirit and devotion to bring to their task. Higher grade men can be found, but they must receive higher grade training.

Fit quarters.—The work in Latin America lies under the shadow of the cathedral. Better class Latins, even when out of sympathy with Catholicism, will not worship in hovels. Most of our congregations use rented quarters. These are anything but churchly. A few of them were once cattle sheds. Any hope of large evangelistic advance is conditioned by the provision of suitable church edifices.

A social ministry.—The church as a community servant is one conception that the Latin mind has lacked. Religion has been dogma or ritual. This new conception appeals to the progressive group. Kingdom strategy therefore demands that this type of work be stressed.

Standardized education.—Schools have proved, since the days of William Taylor, the most direct way to public confidence in Latin America. However, left to themselves, these schools have shown startling differences in the grade of work done. All our schools must be brought to the point where they do the best work.

Sunday-school development.—Supplementing secular education, we must seize our chance to mold the coming South America. Our Sunday schools should be the link between the upper class, who have been in our schools, and the poor who have been in our congregations. A full Sunday-school program may change the character of our work in a decade.

Medical work.—This, a new type of social service in South America, has met with such instant response that the program for the future should include a large use of this agency.

The immediate need.—For the features of the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church that affect Latin America as a whole this program for 1925 has been approved:

MEXICO

"AND WHO IS MY NEIGHBOR?"

America's responsibility below the Rio Grande.—One thousand, eight hundred and eighty-three miles of the southern border of the United States provide the northern border of the Republic of Mexico. With a territory more than equal to a fourth of the United States and a population of only twenty persons to the square mile, the future development of this treasure house provides one of the world's challenges to an international Christianity.

The United States can not dodge its responsibility for the welfare of Mexico. For one thing, contiguity has been recognized in diplomacy as introducing international obligations. In the second place, previous acts by the United States, including what General U. S. Grant called "one of the most unjust wars ever waged by a stronger against a weaker nation," have deprived Mexico of more territory than she still holds and thus have exerted a profound influence upon her development. Finally, large investments by American citizens have bound together the economic welfare of the two peoples.

The destiny of Mexico is largely conditioned by the policy of the United States, and it is imperative that the United States face this obligation determined to secure the welfare of the Mexican people before every other consideration.

Mexico's present situation.—Mexico is just emerging from a long period of revolution. Since Porfirio Diaz fled in 1911, one revolution has followed another. General Obregon, who became President in 1920, seems to be bringing peace and a measure of solution to the problems of the country.

The stability of any Mexican administration will in the long run depend upon its success in dealing with the land question. During the years that Diaz was in power laws ostensibly passed to stabilize land holdings really succeeded in reducing the vast majority of the people to peonage. Most of the revolutions of the last decade have, at bottom, been attempts to get the land back into the hands of its original owners. This process is now under way all over Mexico, and must be recognized in any program for helping the Mexican people.

The Mexican people.—Indians, whites and those of mixed blood, the mestizos, make up the fifteen million population of Mexico. It is estimated that there are about five million pure-blooded Indians and a much larger number of mestizos. The Spanish-speaking whites have generally ruled the country.

While the official language is Spanish, people for the most part speak various Indian dialects, of which 180 have been distinguished. There are towns in which different dialects are spoken on the same street.

The people live in much the same manner as they must have before the coming of the Spanish conquerors. The houses are adobe, the cooking vessels largely clay, the food mainly corn, beans and chili peppers. Mexicans are nominal members of the Roman Catholic church, but remain as superstitious and even as idolatrous as before Christianity came to their country.

What Mexico thinks of the United States.—Almost all Mexicans are intensely suspicious of the United States. The majority hate the United States. Practically every newspaper in the country gives evidence of a fear that the United States is determined to add more to the 930,590 square miles already wrested from Mexico.

The operations of many of the mining and oil companies have added to their suspicions. Threats of intervention, prompted by certain American interests, have served only to exasperate the Mexicans. It can not be said that American diplomacy has always conducted itself in a way to make such resentment less.

THE SALVATION OF MEXICO

Political salvation.—It begins to look as though Mexico would win her own political salvation, provided she is not interfered with. She has reduced her army from 72,000 to 40,000. Her administration is gradually working out a series of land laws that insure the greatest reform possible at this date. The constitution adopted in 1917, and since then adjusted in various parts, will, if adhered to, give Mexico a modern democratic form of government.

The greatest contribution that could be made at the present time to the solution of political problems of Mexico would be evidence of the disinterested good will of the United States, or of any large portion of the American public. Such evidence as the Methodist Episcopal Church or other evangelical bodies can give of their interest in and sympathy with the democratic aspirations of the Mexican people will be a distinct help toward the political salvation of the country.

Economic salvation.—Mexico is determined to be free from the old system of great estates owned by a few wealthy families and the church. The new land laws all point in this direction. They, likewise, seek to reserve for the Mexican people the natural resources that have been largely exploited by foreign capital.

Mexico is one of the great mining centers of the world. More than half of the world's silver has been taken out of her hills, and copper, iron, gold, precious and semi-precious stones are also found in abundance. There were 919 oil wells in 1917 with a potential production of 1,337,012 barrels daily. In 1919, 80,557,-229 barrels of oil were shipped out of the country.

All these riches have seemingly brought Mexico more woe than wealth. The large corporations have felt almost no responsibility for the welfare of their Mexican employees. Bishop Thirkield tells of a single foreign corporation that reported net profits of $49,000,000 in one year but that has not expended $100,000 in the last ten years for the uplift of the Mexican people.

Anything that can be done to help Mexico secure a square deal in the development of her internal resources and raise the Mexican people from the squalor in which most of them live, will be a contribution toward the economic salvation of the land.

Educational salvation.—Hand in hand with the poverty goes the illiteracy of the masses of Mexico. Superstition is still a potent force in the daily life. Internal warfare has made impossible the carrying through of any government scheme for education, even had the teachers been available.

Mexican leaders realize that it is impossible to build a modern democracy on an illiterate citizenship. Yet the attempt to deal with the educational problems of Mexico has hardly begun. No form of help is more needed or will command quicker attention in Mexico today than the conducting of schools of the first grade.

The Aztecas Mission, Mexico City

Religious salvation.—Religious conditions in Mexico are much like those in other Latin countries, except that the break between the political leaders, most of whom are socialists, and the church is more open than elsewhere.

The constitution of 1917 forbids any ecclesiastical body from owning property. This is a law evoked only to protect the Republic against the great land holdings of the Roman Catholic Church. The monasteries and convents have been closed and several religious orders and ecclesiastical leaders have been excluded from the country.

The drift toward materialism and agnosticism is everywhere to be noted. A new conception of religion as a way of life and social uplift must be introduced immediately if Mexico is not to lose herself in the wastes of irreligion. For this reason, a wise evangelical advance is needed as perhaps never before.

THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

The occupation of Mexico.—Mexico was one of the first centers toward which the eyes of the Methodist Episcopal Church turned after it had been aroused to foreign missionary zeal. It proved impossible to carry through the suggestion made in the General Conference of 1835 until 1871 when, under the inspiration of Bishop Haven, with an appropriation of $10,000, the work was opened.

Under the leadership of William Butler, who had the honor of founding the work in India as well, the Methodist Episcopal Church entered Mexico City, planting its headquarters in a part of the old monastery of San Francisco, "one of the most extensive and wealthy institutions in the world." The property had been taken from the Roman Catholic Church by the Mexican government, following the downfall of the Emperor Maximilian. It had passed through many hands, being used as a theater and a circus. The help of an Irish Catholic brought it into Methodist hands for $8,150.

The work grew rapidly. From Mexico City it spread to many other cities, and congregations were planted at Pachuca, the capital of the state of Hidalgo; Orizaba; Puebla, also a state capital; Guanajuato, capital of the state of the same name; Queretaro and elsewhere.

Through days of revolution.—Naturally the work of the church suffered heavily during the period following the fall of Diaz in 1911. Many of the members of the evangelical churches were leaders in the revolutionary movement. On the other hand, many excesses were committed by roving bands that were practically free from any central authority. Church members were killed, churches burned, some pastors were held for ransom, many members were impoverished. At times it was impossible to hold annual conference sessions as planned. Observers feared lest the work in Mexico should be disorganized beyond the point where it could show strength for years to come.

Just the opposite has been the result. The church has been purged of its baser elements. Evangelicalism has proved its sympathy with reform, and a wise division of territory has helped launch a more vigorous campaign than ever in the past.

In 1914 representatives of the various missions working in Mexico, drew up a plan whereby the territory of the Republic was allotted so that there was no overlapping work and, more important, no neglected districts. It was also decided to unite the forces for the establishment of various educational and publishing agencies of high grade.

Important territory.—As the plan was finally carried into effect in 1919, it made the Methodist Episcopal Church responsible for the Protestant work in the states of Guanajuato, Queretaro, Hidalgo, Puebla, Tlaxcala, half of the state of Mexico, and a part of the state of Morelos. In the Federal District and in the City of Mexico, which are regarded as common territory, the work is shared with other missions. The population of the region for which the Methodist Episcopal Church is exclusively responsible is 3,900,000.

Study of the history and topography of Mexico will show the great importance of this high plateau upon which the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church is centered. It is not too much to say that all the great movements and leaders of Mexico in all realms have had their birth in this region. That it shall be the scene of a vital Christianity in years to come is a matter of utmost importance.

The church today.—There are dozens of congregations in Mexico that deserve special notice in such a volume as this. The advance in self-support is one evidence of the vigor of their life. In the last year they registered an advance of $57,700 (286 per cent) in giving. A single congregation, the Gante church in Mexico City, that was giving 2,500 pesos in 1920, went up to 6,000 pesos in 1921 and 13,800 in 1922. Every district in the Mexico Conference can provide almost equally striking examples. There are six large congregations that are self-supporting.

More striking is the broadening scope of the work being done. In half a dozen centers, Methodism is now giving the Protestant interpretation of a full gospel, with features that minister to the social, economic and physical, as well as the spiritual needs of the Mexicans. Such work elicits the heartiest support from the authorities, who can think in terms of community uplift even when their past experience with organized religion has made them suspicious of the church. This is the reason why, at the time when the stringent provisions of the Constitution of 1917 are being enforced against Catholics, the Protestant churches find themselves free to go forward as never before.

Within the past two or three years a significant development of Sunday-school work, of the Epworth League, and of lay leadership has come in the Methodist Church of Mexico. In co-operation with the Board of Foreign Missions the Epworth League has held two institutes, with courses of study approved by the Central Office, that have proved not only of value in putting the organization upon a stable basis, but have provided a large number of young lay workers.

LINES OF ADVANCE

Helping to solve social problems.—Institutional churches in large cities attack directly the causes of social misery. The Gante church in Mexico City, for example, can now report a children's church, a night school, special classes for women, a dispensary, headquarters for social work, beside the regular church auditorium.

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these"—Good Samaritan Hospital, Guanajuato

Even more extensive social programs are projected elsewhere.

The fight against filth, carried on from these church centers, is of large importance, and is showing good results. The same can be said of the agitation against the increasing intemperance that is one of the most disquieting facts in present day Mexico. Much help has been sent from the United States by the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals to the missionaries who have been leading in this effort.

Much enthusiasm has been roused in Mexico by the establishment of a farm school at Queretaro, where men are being fitted for occupancy of the land that the government is pledged to provide. This school is trying to produce teachers of farmers, as well as to teach farming, and is being warmly supported by the government.

Well-tried methods.—Nor are methods that have proved their power during past years being abandoned. Education is being pushed. The government hopes some day to be able to provide a common school education for every Mexican child. That day, however, is a long way in the future.

At present the schools of the church are the most effective educational agencies in Mexico, and are crowded to the limit. Plans are being made for the establishment of academies of higher grade, and ultimately it is hoped that there may be a union Christian university in Mexico City.

The medical approach, such as has been used by a man like Dr. L. B. Salmans, for decades in the Hospital del Buen Samaritano at Guanajuato, must be continued. Plans call for an extension of dispensary and hospital work into several needy sections. This work, after the cost of introducing it, proves largely self-supporting.

The main drive.—Asked to outline its immediate objectives the Methodist Episcopal Church of Mexico has said that it will double its membership, plant itself permanently in important centers with institutional programs, largely increase the amount of lay leadership, multiply its educational service and have a church completely self-supporting within the near future.

The immediate need.—When a church that has been punished by such conditions as have obtained in Mexico talks this way, its brethren in more favored circumstances will never be content to support it in a niggardly way. The program of support and advance that the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved for Mexico for 1925 declares that:

PANAMA

THE CROSSROADS OF THE WESTERN WORLD

Panama may become the most important spot on American soil before the close of this century. Certainly it will be to the West what Singapore has been to the East—the place where the currents of commerce meet and cross.

What the canal means.—By the opening of the Panama Canal, ports on the Pacific coast of South America are brought nearer to New York than they are to San Francisco. It is possible to ship by water from the Orient to New York and even to Western Europe almost as quickly and much more cheaply than by the land-and-water routes. Even transcontinental commerce in the United States is bound to be profoundly affected. The World War has prevented the Canal from giving full demonstration of its value, but in the race for world markets which is now just beginning it will surely be a factor of immense importance.

The possession of the Canal puts a world obligation on the United States.

The Protestant approach.—Although there had been Protestant work on the Isthmus of Panama since the days of William Taylor, little impression was made until the United States undertook the beginning of that enterprise, when several missionary societies from the British West Indies and the United States entered the Canal Zone.

In 1916 representatives of most of the Protestant mission boards, missionaries and members of the evangelical churches of Latin America held in Panama a conference concerning work in Latin countries. This conference, which commanded attention throughout the religious world, served greatly to increase the interest in the Protestant movement in Panama itself.

METHODIST WORK IN PANAMA

A definite field.—When the first missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church arrived in Panama in 1906, he found other missions confining their attention largely to the laborers of the Canal Zone. These were divided into two classes. Negroes from the British West Indies were providing most of the manual laborers, and their spiritual needs were being looked after by the British societies. On the other hand, a large group of Americans were employed in more responsible positions, and among these the societies from the United States were working.

Because of this, it was decided that the Methodist Episcopal Church, while co-operating in the work for Americans that was finally to result in the formation of the Union Church of the Canal Zone, should center its effort upon the Spanish-speaking inhabitants of the Republic of Panama. This work is still exclusively in Methodist hands.

What is Panama?—Government in Panama is divided between the Republic, with an area of 32,380 square miles and a population of 403,122, and the Canal Zone, a strip five miles wide on each side of the Canal, with a population of about 22,000, all workers on the "big ditch."

The population of the Canal Zone is being reduced steadily and will soon consist of not more than the minimum needed to operate the Canal and keep it in repair.

The locks of the Panama Canal

It can be seen that by confining its work largely to the Republic of Panama, the Methodist Episcopal Church has before it a field of increasing rather than decreasing size.

In Panama City.—In 1906 the first, and still the outstanding, Methodist institution was built in the city of Panama, the Seawall Church. Services are conducted here for a Spanish and English-speaking congregation, the latter entirely self-supporting. There is a school, built in 1917, the highest-grade educational enterprise conducted by our church in Panama. The Centenary provided additional buildings in which an enlarged staff carries on a fuller evangelistic and educational program. A Sunday school is conducted in another part of the city.

"The region of the Canal is not a good place to put anything that is to stay put," a missionary once said, "but it is a marvelous opportunity to put down something that will spread along the currents that meet and cross here—forty-five nations, thirty-six languages, sojourners from everywhere now live on the isthmus. And over the whole situation is the dominating efficiency and potency of the Canal. Every man who passes through must carry with him a new conception of what real accomplishment means. Likewise, if he meets a worthy illustration of what the gospel of the open Bible and the free conscience does when worthily represented in effective working form, he will carry with him an influence that will affect his after life."

English-speaking congregation at Seawall church, Panama City

Other centers.—The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church has also been established at David, capital of the province of Chiriqui; at Colon, the great seaport on the Atlantic end of the Canal; and at Chitre.

In David the Centenary has built a school which is so far doing only elementary work, but is to be developed into the leading institution of higher education in western Panama. There is a flourishing Sunday school, out of which a congregation will ultimately be developed.

In Colon the Methodist Episcopal Church holds property, but its work is confined to an effort for some non-English speaking groups carried on in the plant of the Union Church.

A promising work had been begun at Chitre, where property has been secured, but the shortage of workers has forced the temporary closing of its doors.

THE OCCUPATION OF PANAMA

Locating the centers.—It cannot be too much emphasized that the Methodist Episcopal Church is responsible for the evangelization of all the Spanish-speaking and Indian inhabitants of the Republic of Panama. With more than 350,000 of these it can be seen that the occupation of the country can scarcely be said to have begun while there is work in only four cities, one of which is for the present neglected.

The next ten years, therefore, should see rapid extension of the work of the church, until this strategic land is occupied in fact as well as in name. To this end there will probably be established seven circuits each with a large number of stations. Five of these circuits should be organized at once, namely, those radiating from David, Chitre, Panama City, Porto Bello, and Yavisa. Later, as the work develops, the Colon and Almirante circuits should come into being.

Reaching the Indians.—

It will be seen that three of the heads of circuits mentioned are already occupied. Porto Bello and Yavisa will provide the bases from which advance will be made upon the San Blas and Chucunaque Indians. Here are 55,000 savages, so primitive that their languages have yet to be reduced to writing, with practically nothing being done for them, yet living within 200 miles of United States territory! Here is a missionary challenge that the church dare not deny.

When the Almirante circuit is organized, it will make possible work among the Bocas Indians.

Types of work.—Throughout the Republic of Panama, whether working with the Indians or Spanish-speaking natives, emphasis is to be placed upon evangelism. Itinerants will go into parts where now no religion of any sort, save paganism, penetrates, preaching as they travel. Dependence is placed upon the American Bible Society, which has already, through its Panama agency, distributed 718,408 volumes of the Scriptures, to increase their form of pioneering.

A system of primary schools, feeding into higher institutions at Panama and David, will gradually be developed. Panama needs modern education, especially in the great region outside the Canal Zone. (It must not be forgotten that, in comparison with the Republic of Panama, the Canal Zone is about the size of a postage stamp on an envelope.) But education is to be provided not for its own sake, but for the formation of Christian character, providing a Christian citizenship for the state, and providing workers for the Christian enterprise.

There will be a call also for medical service, to deal with the tropical diseases that, outside the Canal Zone, work havoc with the people, and to provide an opening wedge for entrance to the savage Indian tribes. It may well prove that medical missions will furnish the most effective method of evangelizing these primitive peoples at Panama.

The immediate need.—The importance of the work in Panama appeals to any American with imagination enough to understand the significance of the Panama Canal. The work of the church is being developed slowly and solidly, but it cannot wait indefinitely if it is not to fall hopelessly behind the development of the situation with which it is supposed to cope. After careful study the Methodist Episcopal Church has accordingly approved the following program as needed in Panama for 1925:

COSTA RICA

A LAND IN THE MAKING

The "Rich Coast."—The Spaniards who first landed on the narrow strip lying from two to four hundred miles west of the Isthmus of Panama gave to their new home the name of Costa Rica, the "rich coast." For centuries the name seemed a gigantic irony, for the conquerors found little of the easy wealth that was the portion of those who seized other parts of Central and South America.

Today, however, Costa Rica is a rich coast in every sense. Success in coffee cultivation has brought the standards of living of the republic to a high level, and the coast land along the Atlantic, once almost uninhabitable, is now the greatest source of bananas in the world. The high type of citizenship, if properly cultivated, guarantees that better wealth of character that is the backbone of a strong nation.

Costa Rica today.—Four hundred thousand people inhabit the 23,000 square miles of this, the next to the smallest of the Central American Republics. Most of them live in a territory within a radius of thirty miles of the capital, San Jose.

Here, on a plateau almost 4,000 feet above sea level, climate and soil combine to make living easy.

The Costa Rican is not, however, as indigent as many other Latins. His is the purest Spanish blood in the western hemisphere, and the lack of Indian slaves has made it necessary for him through generations to work. Today, therefore, his government, in comparison with those of other Central American states, is strong, progressive, and effective. Fairly good roads and state-owned railways lead to the principal ports on both coasts. It is the boast of Costa Rica that she has more school teachers than soldiers, with a consequent higher rate of literacy than is to be found elsewhere in Latin America.

International philanthropy.—Since 1915, Costa Rica has had an unusual object lesson in American philanthropy. The International Health Board (Rockefeller Foundation) has been co-operating with the government to eliminate the hook worm, which has been found to affect 52.3 per cent of the people examined. By the end of 1921 more than 300,000 people had been reached with remarkable results. The improvements in Costa Rican life will be tremendous, while the enterprise forms a valuable means of preparing public opinion for other forms of help from North America.

CHRISTIAN STRATEGY IN COSTA RICA

The religious situation.—Until after the Centenary was launched, Costa Rica remained "the last frontier of Protestant missionary work on the American continent." Several missions have gone to the West Indian Negroes on the banana plantations, but have not reached the Costa Ricans on the central plateau.

At the same time the drift away from the established church has assumed large proportions. Dana G. Munro declared that "In spiritual as well as in temporal affairs the church has now almost entirely lost its hold upon the people. Many of the women are still very devout, but the men, especially among the upper classes, are for the most part frankly irreligious." (The Five Republics of Central America, page 13.)

Methodism solely responsible.—In 1917 the Interdenominational Committee on Survey and Occupation of Latin America formally assigned Costa Rica to the Methodist Episcopal Church, provided work began soon. Within six months the representatives of the Board of Foreign Missions were investigating the country at first hand.

A Mexican pioneer.—The founding of the work in Costa Rica shows how missionary work may propagate itself. For one of the two who first spied out the land was a product of the mission in Mexico, the Rev. Eduardo Zapata. While workers have since come from the United States, the presence of Mr. Zapata gave the new enterprise the benefit of appearing as "Latin work for Latins."

Successful from the start.—From the beginning, the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Costa Rica has been astonishingly successful. Evangelistic and educational work have been strongly planted. There are now eight missionaries with three congregations, 100 church members and a total constituency of 750. There is a fine school in San Jose with an enrolment that has climbed in two years from seventeen to 125. The normal school at Heredia is preparing teachers of high grade.

Government leaders have gone out of their way to show sympathy. The President of the Republic has twice appeared at exercises of the San Jose school, and the Methodist program has been publicly approved by many state officials.

Recently, when a Costa Rican law against the entrance of foreign ecclesiastics was invoked to detain for more than a day at a landing port a Roman Catholic archbishop from the United States, the Methodist Episcopal bishop was met with passes over the government railways and shown every courtesy in expediting his visit.

The church in San Jose, under the pastorate of Mr. Zapata, has built up a strong program. In addition to the regular preaching and Sunday-school services, there is a camp-fire organization, a boy scout troop and a vested choir. The growth of church and schools seems to be conditioned solely by the support forthcoming from the American church.

"Latin work for Latins." The man on horseback second from the left is a pioneer missionary who came to Costa Rica from Mexico

THE CENTRAL AMERICAN BASE

A center for worker-training.—So unusual has been the response to the Methodist program in Costa Rica that it is clear that this country is to provide the base for operations in Central America. This calls for a rapid provision of superior educational facilities.

The present school in San Jose must be enlarged so that finally it will become the best boarding school of higher grade in Central America. Even more attention must be given to the development of the schools in which are to be trained preachers and teachers.

While large churches must be planted in the four leading cities and smaller churches in at least twenty-five other towns, it is wise policy to give this preparation of leaders first attention.

"My conviction is clear," Bishop Thirkield has testified, "that here we are to raise up the group of teachers and Christian ministers and workers who shall evangelize the lands bordering the Pacific. At Panama, the crossroads of the western world, we must strengthen our work. The position is strategic and of singular importance. But here in the highlands, away from the wickedness of an open port, free from the contagious example of worldly and careless thousands from the States; here where the people are turning their faces to the light, we shall find an atmosphere in which to grow the workers and leaders for the future." (The Christian Advocate, April 14, 1921.)

The immediate need.—In Costa Rica the work is at that sensitive point where it must either go ahead immediately, or it may wither. The church has recognized this in approving a program that not only supports the present work, but makes possible meeting the most pressing needs. This is the approved program for Costa Rica in 1925:

PERU

BIGOTRY'S STRONGHOLD

The old Spanish tradition.—Peru is the most Spanish of all Spanish-American countries. The power of the Roman Catholic church is still felt in every department of its life. Not until 1915 was the constitution altered to make it legal to worship under other than Roman Catholic forms. A Catholic revival is now in progress, and the ecclesiastical hierarchy was never stronger.

There is no such rift between intellectuals and the church in Peru as in other Latin American nations. A recent traveler reports that "It is clear that Peruvian liberals will have to come out boldly and be willing to take the consequences of a mortal combat with the clergy before the country can enjoy real liberty."

A growing work.—Despite the opposition of the Romanists, Protestant work in Peru is growing. There is not the fanatical opposition on the part of the masses that once made advance almost impossible. Since religious liberty was granted, one in close touch with the situation has reported that, "The work has developed as much during one year of liberal worship as during five years of effort and growth under the old conditions." Congregations, although forced to meet in private homes, small rented halls, or sometimes even in railway stations, have increased rapidly. A growth in membership of about one-third yearly is now expected and the contributions of the Peruvian converts have mounted by 330 per cent since 1916.

PROBLEMS GEOGRAPHIC

Peru, with a territory as large as the United States east of the Mississippi, with the exception of Alabama, Georgia and Florida, presents one of the most needy mission fields in the world. Its population is about 4,800,000, of whom not more than 750,000 are whites. Indeed, most of these have a certain amount of Indian blood in their veins. The Indians are exploited as in all Latin American countries and there are other classes whose spiritual needs are not being met. Some of the distinctive missionary problems of Peru come from the geographical conditions of the country. These may be summarized as problems of the cities, of the mining camps, and of the Indians.

Problems of the cities.—There are several commanding cities in Peru, such as the capital, Lima, containing the oldest university in the new world; its port, Callao; Arequipa, Huancayo, and the ancient capital, Cuzco. The city problem, as it exists in these centers, is not greatly different from the same problem in other countries. Student bodies, tenement groups, schoolless children, unevangelized multitudes—all require their peculiar type of service.

There are still several large cities within the territory of the Methodist Episcopal Church that have not even been entered, and while it remains true that the church owns only one unfinished edifice in which worship is being conducted, it can not be said that occupation is anywhere adequate.

Problems of the mining camps.—On the high slopes of the Andes some of the greatest mining camps in the world are growing. Largely the corporations responsible are financed by foreign capital. The directors of these corporations are in most cases eager to have Protestant work in the towns that they have called into being. Conditions are much like those that once made the camps of America's West notorious. Open vice, absence of all modern sanitation, and a merciless exploitation of cheap labor cry aloud for effective evangelistic effort. Only a beginning has been made.

Problems of the Indians.—In all that part of Peru that lies back from the coast practically the entire population, outside of a few owners of large estates, is Indian. More than half a million of these people, living in remote sections, are still pagan and others are nominal adherents of a debased form of Romanism.

The exploitation of the Indians of Peru is a story that has never been told in its full horror. Evangelical missionaries are only just beginning to reach these people with a type of Christianity that offers hope for the solution of their social as well as religious problems.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has up to this time had no work exclusively designed to reach the Indians. The development in the brief period of religious freedom has been in the cities and mining camps. The time is now here, however, when it must reach out to this most needy class of all Peru. Plans for this extension of work form a part of the immediate program.

PROBLEMS SOCIAL

Studying Peru from another angle, that country is found struggling with problems that can not be isolated in any one section but affect her life as a whole. Toward the solution of these social problems, the Methodist Episcopal Church is contributing its leadership.

Problems of morals and democracy.—Peru is afflicted with the same moral problems that beset other Latin peoples—intemperance, unchastity, a light regard for the value of a pledge, a conception of religion as a formal adherence rather than as a mode of life—these and other vices sap the national strength. It is not too much to say that the work of the Protestant congregations is almost the only force in Peru directly dealing with such needs.

There are twenty-seven cities and towns in Peru in which the Methodist Episcopal Church is now regularly carrying on work. In hardly one of these, however, does it own the quarters in which services are held. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that, in the program for advance, the Peru mission puts the building of certain churches and chapels at the head of the list of needs.

As surely as low morals will undermine the stamina, so surely will contempt for honest labor undermine the democratic ideals of Peru. It is, alas, true that today any physical labor is thought so degrading as to exclude the worker from all but the very lowest society. For this reason the testimony of Protestant schools to the dignity of manual work is as much needed in Peru as the effort of the Protestant church to combat the other social evils.

Problems of education.—Although the oldest university of either of the American continents is located in Lima, Peru stands tenth in the list of Latin American countries in regard to the education of her citizenship. Less than twenty per cent of the population can read and write. Primary education is supposed to be compulsory, yet less than half of the children are enrolled in school and the average attendance is less than half of the enrolment.

An educational mission from North America has been attempting to deal with this situation for several years and has made some progress. It has found itself, however, handicapped by the policy of the Catholic church.

No schools in the country have won more attention than the Institute Andino, a coeducational boarding school at Huan-cayo; the Callao High School; the Institute Norteamericano, a boarding school for boys in Lima; and the high school for girls conducted in the same city by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. The growth of these schools has been remarkable. Despite determined opposition on the part of some priests, enrolment in the school at Huancayo has grown from 150 in 1919 to 290 in 1922; in Callao, from 262 in 1917 to 520 in 1922; and in Lima the newly established school already has an enrolment of 176.

These schools are all approaching complete self-support. One has reached that goal. Since almost eighty per cent of the students in them come from non-evangelical homes, it can be seen how important is the contribution that they can make toward overcoming popular prejudice.

It is also necessary to establish day schools to act as feeders for these schools of higher grade. Not only is the government unable to provide school facilities for all, but conditions in the government schools, where religious instruction by Catholic priests is required, are such that it is frequently inadvisable to allow children from Protestant homes to study in them. The primary schools already established by the Methodist Episcopal Church have been of such a high grade that they have won wide popularity, and from many parts of the republic requests are coming for the extension of the Methodist day school system.

Problems of leadership.—The conditions holding Peru back will never be permanently changed until Peruvian citizens are ready to lead in the work of reform. The discovery and training of indigenous leadership thus becomes a major part of the evangelical program.

Two projects are included in the plans of the Methodist Episcopal Church to deal with this need. The first is for the theological seminary at Lima, which will be a union institution, ministering to all the Protestantism of Peru. The second is a Bible Institute for Indians at Huan-cayo, established only a year ago by Bishop Thirkield, which has already produced five ministerial candidates for this needy field.

Problems of sanitation.—Except in the large cities, no attempt has been made to provide hygienic surroundings for the people of Peru. The result is that even such a city as Callao is reputed to have the highest death rate in the world. Among the Indians, it is estimated that there is an infant mortality rate of eighty per cent.

So great has been the lack of modern medicine that a group of British and American residents have provided a hospital in which the Methodist Episcopal Church has begun its medical program. At the present time the small staff in this hospital is overwhelmed with the demand for its services. It is expected, however, that additions to the force will make extension of this service possible, especially to Indian communities.

THE FORWARD PROGRAM

The advance program for the Methodist Episcopal Church in Peru can be summarized under four heads:

Permanent Protestant churches.—The first necessity is to place congregations in important centers in permanent homes. It will never be possible nor desirable to build edifices as large as the cathedrals that are already to be found in Lima and other cities. But it is essential to gather our people out of the inadequate and frequently unsanitary rented quarters in which they now attempt to worship and house them in well-designed churches and chapels.

Strengthening Protestant schools.—The Methodist school system in Peru is young and still lacks equipment essential in the provision of modern education. The Centenary made possible large educational advance. It is now necessary to follow this up in such a way that there may be a strong foundation of Protestant day schools upon which to rest securely.

The training of ministers is also of immediate importance. Plans under way call for the development of a theological seminary at Lima that will serve the evangelical churches of Bolivia as well as Peru. To these plans the Methodist Episcopal Church is whole-heartedly committed.

Spreading a hospital.—As soon as the British-American Hospital reaches its full capacity for work in the present quarters—which will be within a very short time,

Boy Scouts at the Lima High School

The foundation on which a strong nation may be built if adequate staff is provided—its influence should be carried to the interior parts of Peru through the establishment of a chain of dispensaries. There should also be dispensaries opened in connection with the institutional church work in the cities.

Reaching the Indians.—No more appealing work lies before the church than that for the Indians. It is agreed that this enterprise can not longer be delayed. First approach may be made by the opening of dispensaries, although educational and evangelistic work is also called for and planned. It will take the utmost wisdom and devotion to reach this exploited and suspicious portion of the population of Peru. The difficulty of the task in large measure constitutes the challenge.

The immediate need.—To deal with the situation in this land where religious bigotry is making its last stand, the Methodist Episcopal Church has authorized the following program for 1925:

BOLIVIA

A NEGLECTED COUNTRY

Cut off from the sea by five of her sister republics, Bolivia remains one of the least known Latin American nations. This is not because it is a small land, for the most recent estimate of the area, 605,600 square miles, makes Bolivia about as large as the United States when it challenged world attention with its Declaration of Independence. It is not because of poverty, for there are rich tin, gold, copper and silver mines on the slopes of the Andes. It is not because of sterility, for three-fifths of Bolivia is valleys, sloping and alluvial plains and forests, where modern agriculture can raise large harvests.

Population.—In this great country less than 3,000,000 people (five to the square mile) live. As in Mexico, Peru and Ecuador the majority are Indians, either those still living in a primitive state or those who make up the peon class. From the American viewpoint, these Indians lack practically every right, privilege and advantage that is supposed to belong to citizens of a modern republic. There are not more than 300,000 whites, in whose hands are the great estates, as well as the agencies of the government. The degradation of the Indians is pitiful.

Transportation.—The development of a country situated as is Bolivia is, of course, dependent upon transportation. Up to date there are only 765 miles of railway, linking the capital, La Paz, with the coast by three lines. Two rivers, the Mamore and Beni, tributaries of the Amazon, provide the only natural outlet to the sea. Both are navigable for large vessels, and from them launches and other boats ply the smaller streams of the country.

WINNING THE MINDS OF A NATION

Returning from Bolivia as recently as 1917, Samuel G. Inman was able to write that "it was a real shock to find that there was a country on the globe where so little Christian work is being done."

Perhaps this was because of unprofitable lines of approach on the part of the Protestant missions. At any rate the Methodist Episcopal Church is now coming into a place of peculiar importance in the life of this nation because of a policy very different from that followed in most Latin countries.

This policy has been radically altered since the first minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church was appointed to work in Bolivia in 1901. To be sure, the initial years of zealous preaching and Bible teaching provided a firm foundation but, since 1906, the work has proceeded along very unusual lines.

Education for the upper classes.—The approach of the preacher and Bible colporteur was necessarily to the poor. The upper classes, whose allegiance to the Roman Catholic Church was becoming constantly weaker, were still almost completely beyond the reach of Protestant effort. Irreligion seemed about to overwhelm the country.

The pioneers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, surveying conditions in Bolivia, realized that the greatest unmet need of the country, in any realm but the spiritual, was that of first-class education. Although there was a law providing for universal compulsory education, only two per cent of the population were in school. Higher institutions were conspicuous by their absence. As a result, the country was held back by a failure to give adequate training to those who would naturally provide its leadership.

In this situation, the missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church brought forward the proposal that the government co-operate with them in the establishment of schools that would fill this gap. Such a course seemed revolutionary—a Roman Catholic country co-operating with a Protestant mission for the conducting of schools that were to mold coming leaders! But in 1906 the government of Bolivia decided to endorse this proposal, and made a grant for the establishment of a school in La Paz. Later a similar school was planted in Cochabamba. Each is called the American Institute.

Two centers of influence.—From the day of the opening of the American Institutes in La Paz and Cochabamba they have been outstanding successes. For the first years of this work the government provided subsidy. Financial difficulties, growing out of the World War, made it necessary to withdraw this in 1915. Since then the schools, which have an annual budget of $76,000, have been supported by their own income from tuitions, plus $10,000 contributed by the Board of Foreign Missions.

Student classes.—The boys in these schools, which start with the kindergarten and carry through the high school, do not come from any one class. "The sons of small merchants, of wealthy miners and ranchers, of Indian burden-bearers, of members of the President's cabinet, of ex-Presidents, of members of the official circles of the government, learn to work and to play together and to forget that there is such a thing as caste."

The girls' departments have been equally successful. All of them are running to capacity, giving the students the finest education to be had in Bolivia, with acquaintance with the spirit and ideals of a forward-looking Protestantism. There have been more than 6,000 pupils in the two schools since their founding (in 1922 there were 381 enrolled) and of those who have finished the course, a large number have already achieved recognition.

"The school," says a veteran missionary, "is the most effective evangelizing agency in Bolivia. By means of Bible classes and the Christian example of the teachers, the students are brought to a knowledge of the Christian life. Even though many of them have

A NEGLECTED PEOPLE

The other undeveloped field of service in Bolivia, to which the Methodist Episcopal Church has turned its attention, is the uplift of the Indian. There are 900,000 of these Indians, most of whom live in a primitive state and under the most pitiable conditions. The leading newspaper of La Paz has thus described their life:

"The condition of the Indians has changed all too little since the times of the Spanish domination. They continue to be pariahs, exploited by provincial authorities and brutalized by alcohol. The state has entered into a kind of partnership with the church; the former to sell alcohol to the Indians (having a monopoly of its sale) and the latter to provide in her festivals the occasion for its consumption.

"The moral, intellectual, and material condition of the Indians is the worst possible, and hinders the progress of the nation, at the same time bringing us face to face with very many and very grave problems which must be solved, the tranquillity of outlying districts being meantime in constant danger."

Exploited as the Indian has been, the work done among his people is difficult in the extreme, for there are those who would rather see him depressed and tractable than educated and able to stand up for his rights. And they are quick to recognize the dangerous revolutionary character of the Christian gospel applied to such conditions.

FUTURE LINES OF ADVANCE

Supporting present work.—The advance program in Bolivia is very clear. The work at present conducted must be continued. This means that the two higher schools for boys and girls, through which the Protestant spirit is being disseminated throughout the country must be strengthened;

The two day schools and five night schools for the Indians must be developed;

The Bible Training School in La Paz, the source of a trained ministry, must be enabled to do efficient work;

The congregations gathered in La Paz, Cochabamba and three other places must be encouraged, and the day brought near when they can be suitably housed.

Occupying new territory.—By agreement

Drinking an alcoholic beverage after mass, in the shade of the chapel, La Paz

among the Protestant forces, a great section of Bolivia, comprising one third of the total area, is left for penetration by the Methodist Episcopal Church. This is the Beni region, a fertile country, lying along the tributaries of the Amazon that give Bolivia its only outlet to the sea. Students from this region are already in the American Institutes at La Paz and Cochabamba. The territory has a larger percentage of pure-blooded Spanish inhabitants than any other in Bolivia, and, strange to say, is less occupied by the Roman Catholic Church than any other region. In much of this region there are neither priests nor churches.

It is desired, therefore, to send a competent missionary, acquainted with Bolivia, into this territory not later than 1925. This pioneer is expected to study the land and report to the church as to the most promising fields in which to begin work.

The immediate need.—Facing the situation in Bolivia, the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved the following program:

CHILE

Where Chile would be if it were revolved about the equator and placed in the Northern Hemisphere

A REPUBLIC WITH A FUTURE

What is Chile like?—Chile, the “shoe-string republic,” appeals to the imagination. What sort of a country can it be, when its coast line is 2,700 miles long and its territory, on the average, only eighty-seven miles wide? Many have been deceived as to its size, which is greater than that of Texas.

Someone has said that if you could take the state of Illinois and squeeze it out until its northern border lay in the middle of Hudson Bay and its southern border in Cuba, you would obtain a fair approximation of Chile. Another has said that if Chile were laid out upon the United States, it would stretch from Portland, Maine, to Portland, Oregon.

Traveling in Chile you pass through three kinds of climate. In the north there are eight or nine hundred absolutely rainless miles, then comes another like distance where there is so little rain that irrigation is necessary, and finally there is another well-watered section of equal size stretching down to the Straits of Magellan. The climate on the whole resembles that of California.

What are the Chileans like?—Even to the casual traveler, the citizens of Chile seem among the most progressive to be found in South America. The Anglo-Saxon is struck by the evidence of early immigration from the British Isles, shown in the Edwards Street or the Pratt Plaza or the O’Higgins Square to be found in many of the leading towns. These families, with the McKennas, the Walkers, the Tuckers and many others came to the fore in the days of the struggle for independence. With the passing of the years, however, they generally proved content to settle down into an oligarchy of wealth, which virtually ruled Chile.

That period has passed. Today, while representatives of these original English families remain, now thoroughly latinized, the leadership of the country is largely in the hands of men whose ancestors came from about the Mediterranean. And these men find Chile ready for democratic advance of every kind. Great changes are coming within a few years.

The latest census shows the population to be 3,870,000. This means that fewer than thirteen people live on every square mile. With an energetic population,

Loading sacks of nitrate large national resources and one of the most securely established governments on the continent, Chile is bound to be a leader in the great advance that is before South America.

THE CHURCH IN CHILE

Established but not secure.—Article IV of the Constitution of Chile declares that "the religion of the Republic of Chile is the Apostolic Roman Catholic, excluding the public functioning of any other." The Catholic clergy have been of a higher grade than elsewhere in South America. The church has produced a better type of morality and has held the allegiance of the ruling classes in a way that it has failed to do elsewhere. It can not be said, however, to be meeting the religious needs of the country.

In truth, Roman Catholicism in Chile today is established, but it is not secure. A plank in the platform upon which President Alessandri was elected in 1920 demanded the separation of Church and State. The mounting tides of labor, feminism, temperance reform, all find Catholicism in opposition. Just as rapidly as they achieve their inevitable triumph, they will loosen the grip of the old ecclesiasticism.

The challenge to Protestantism.—The same forces that spell defeat for an exclusive Catholicism offer unbounded opportunity to an awakened Protestantism. When the Liberal Party was swept into power at the recent election, its platform called for currency reform, the income tax, protection of national industries from foreign aggression, solution of social evils, provision for the education of women and children, prohibition, parliamentary reforms and separation of church and state.

It can be seen that this list of reforms that have received the mandate of the Chilean people includes causes for which Protestantism is struggling. Education of women and children, the basis of the new feminist movement in that country, has long been pushed by the evangelicals as, for example, at the Santiago College for Women, conducted by the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Poisoned by alcohol.—For a long time the evangelicals have been almost alone in their temperance agitation. Chile has been notorious as one of the most intemperate nations. In fact, some travelers have called it the most intemperate. Today, however, far-sighted scientists and Liberal statesmen are joining with Protestants to popularize the motto: "Alcohol is a poison; taken in large or small quantities, it is a poison."

Labor and the church.—The labor situation is demanding more attention than any other factor in Chile today. For almost a century the country has been under the domination of an oligarchy of not more than a hundred land-owning families. With the fortunes of these, the Roman Catholic Church has allied itself. It is common opinion that only the election of a Liberal President prevented armed revolution in 1920. Strikes are common throughout Chile today. The newspapers give pages to labor problems.

HOW THE CHALLENGE IS BEING MET

The two outstanding evangelical forces in Chile today are the Presbyterian and the Methodist Episcopal Churches. Their fields alternate from the Peruvian border to the Straits of Magellan. Between them there is cordial co-operation. Both are striving to introduce a type of Protestantism that will show itself in harmony with all progressive forces. Preaching, teaching, healing are the means employed.

Growing amid difficulties.—The latest figures available show that the Methodist Episcopal Church now has in Chile thirty-six churches, ministering to approximately 5,000 members. This is being done with only a handful of workers, there being only seventeen Chilean members of conference, with eighteen unordained preachers under appointment.

The members of this church at Iquique almost paid for it with their own contributions

Most of the churches have been housed miserably, with the exception of one edifice in Valparaiso. The appeal has been largely limited to the poorest classes because, in a country educated to cathedrals, it is almost impossible to induce members of the upper classes to enter such dilapidated little shacks as have sheltered most Protestant congregations.

Despite their handicaps, however, the churches are active as never before. There has been a great increase in tithing. Sunday schools are being pushed. Special leadership in temperance reform and in work among young people has been provided, and in the leading cities, in temporary quarters, beginnings have been made out of which will grow commanding institutional programs.

Schools with national reputations.—The educational work of the Methodist Episcopal Church is known throughout Chile, largely because of such successful institutions as the Santiago College for Girls, Iquique English College, the Concepcion College for Girls, and the American College for boys, also in Concepcion. The lack in this system has come from its concentration upon students of the upper classes. Required by stringency of funds to be self-supporting, these schools have of necessity placed their fees so high that only the wealthy have been able to take advantage of this opportunity. One of the propositions immediately to be undertaken is the extension of the educational system under Protestant auspices to the masses.

A ministry of healing.—Medical work has been on a restricted scale, but in the large industrial fields, such as the nitrate regions, and in the slums of the cities, there is great need for service of this character, offering a quick means of approach to the poor. Such an enterprise as the dispensary of the Good Samaritan in Santiago has a large influence and its resources are always taxed to their capacity.

Literature an evangelistic force.—The distribution of Christian literature is growing. Not only is the weekly paper issued by the Methodists of Chile, El Heraldo Cristiano, constantly gaining a wider reading, but the book store in Santiago is increasing its sales. This work is self-supporting.

Much of the success in reaching Chile with the gospel in printed form must be credited to the years of seed-sowing by the American Bible Society, working through its La Plata agency. More than 2,000,000 copies of the Scriptures have been distributed by this agency, which also works in Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay. Its pioneer agent, Francis G.

Class in the Union Theological School, Santiago, Chile

Penzotti, gladly suffered persecution and imprisonment in planting the work. Today his son, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, carries on the enterprise.

UNIQUE FEATURES OF THE CHILEAN MISSION

The work in Chile is much like that in other South American countries. A few developments, however, merit special attention.

Hogar Anglo-Chileno.—In order to provide a home for girl students of the University of Chile in which they may have the opportunity of using the English language and learning English customs while in the most wholesome surroundings, there has been opened in Santiago a home that now provides quarters for fifty-three students. These come from the departments of medicine, law, dentistry, pharmacy, physical education, art and pedagogy.

This home for girls was the first institution of its kind in South America and is rendering a much needed service. By means of Bible study classes, lectures, and discussion groups it is possible to present to these university girls the ideals and ideas of Protestantism in a way that is certain to leave a deep impress upon their later years of service. With the student class so rapidly drifting into infidelity, such an approach as is represented in the Hogar Anglo-Chileno deserves wide support.

Bunster Farm.—No Centenary project in South America has attracted more attention than the Bunster Farm, purchased in 1919 to provide a self-supporting school for children of the poor. On these acres an encouraging start has been made in the establishment of a farm that shall demonstrate the latest methods of agriculture and at the same time give practical education to a constantly growing group of students.

The equipment is as yet very primitive and the resources of the farm have been swallowed up in building up an impoverished soil, replacing worn-out machinery, equipment and live stock, and nursing back to health diseased nurseries and orchards. The experiment has, however, gone far enough to arouse interest in many parts of South America. It will eventually prove one of Protestantism's most effective contributions to the solution of Chile's twin problems of illiteracy and poverty.

Temperance propaganda.—Support furnished by the Board of Temperance, Prohibition and Public Morals has made it possible to put a Methodist secretary at work fighting against the entrenched liquor interests of Chile. By establishing connections with the government and with influential societies mass meetings have been held, a news service used by leading papers conducted, much literature distributed, and moving pictures and stereopticon views widely displayed. This propaganda has been peculiarly effective in shops, mines and factories.

Waiting for admission to the dispensary, Santiago, Chile

Continental headquarters.—In view of the geographical location of Methodist work in South America, Chile has proved the center from which much continent-wide work has been conducted. In addition to the temperance agitation already mentioned, the Centenary, the Sunday-school, and the Epworth League headquarters have been located in Santiago.

The Sunday-school program for Chile includes short summer institutes for the training of workers, an increased range of literature, more helps for teachers, a summer school of religious education, daily vacation church schools, co-operation with other evangelical bodies and many other features. This work has been notably successful.

Under the leadership of a part-time secretary the Epworth League is coming to the fore. The summer institute at Angol, held for three successive years, has been remarkable for the results achieved in spite of lack of equipment. Junior League work is also increasing.

THE LINE OF ADVANCE

In a land of stately churches.—The time has come when the Latin must be shown that to join a Protestant church does not mean that he must step from the magnificence of the cathedral into the dinginess of a rented store room.

Not much impression can be made until some adequate church edifices represent the evangelical group in the centers of Chile. Particularly in the capital, where there is not now a single presentable Methodist Church, is it imperative that such be erected. These will not be ornate structures but they will be in thoroughly good architectural taste.

In the city of Santiago, the capital, an institutional church and two other churches must be built. In addition, churches should be erected immediately at Punta Arenas, the dominant city on the Straits of Magellan, in Los Angeles, the capital of the province of Bio Bio, and Ovalle, a city controlling a mining and agricultural country in Coquimbo.

Other churches in other strategic points must follow at an early date. It is said that most of these congregations will become self-supporting within two or three years.

Where education is sceptic.—In the swing away from Catholicism most of the intellectuals of South America have become agnostic, if not atheistic. There is little chance that this condition will be altered in government schools for years to come. For this reason, it is imperative that the Protestant educational effort be kept at the highest possible state of efficiency.

All the higher institutions of learning, mentioned in previous sections, must be reinforced. In many of them the equipment, which has been doing duty since the days of William Taylor, is out of date. In the city of Santiago, it is hoped to open a Nurse and Deaconess Training School in connection with the institutional church, in which nurse training can be given Chilean girls under distinctly Christian auspices.

Day schools in connection with our churches are a necessity and must not only be taught by well-trained teachers but must be carefully supervised. The type of practical education represented by the Bunster Farm must be further developed.

Better men for a better land.—One of the keenest observers of Protestant work in Chile has said that the immediate need is to provide first-class professional schools for training the church ministers and teachers. A Union Bible Seminary is maintained in co-operation with the Presbyterian mission. This school has been conducted in borrowed and utterly inadequate quarters in one of the Methodist churches.

Despite such handicaps, the students are the school's most enthusiastic supporters. Almost first on the Methodist program in Chile must come the placing of this school on a better basis. With a school equipped to give the highest grade of work, the church can prepare a better type of leadership for the Chile that is to be.

The immediate need.—During 1925 the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved the following program:

ARGENTINA

A SOUTH AMERICAN LEADER

"Watch Argentina Grow!"—If Argentina, instead of being south of the equator, were west of the Mississippi (it is as large as twenty Iowas) what a fine time its Booster Clubs would have! "Watch Argentina Grow!" would be the slogan advertised across its more than a million square miles of territory. There are less than ten million people in Argentina today, but if the present rate of increase should continue as it has for the last half century there would be fifty million people on hand in 1970, and two hundred million a century from now.

At that, Argentina will not be crowded. Only fifty millions of its two hundred and fifty millions of acres of tillable soil are as yet under cultivation. When the population is as thick on its plains as it now is in Italy, there will be three hundred and sixty million Argentines. Most of the wealth of the land now comes from ranching, with great wheat fields and cattle herds. But as the smaller farmer increases, under government encouragement, production and income will closely approximate those of our own agricultural states.

Unlike other Latin-American countries, Argentina is populated almost entirely by Europeans. There are a few Indians left in the extreme north and extreme south, but for the most part the land is a mecca for emigrants from the old world. Ninety-two per cent of those are Latins. Argentina expects to develop her life by growth from abroad just as the United States has done.

The city supreme.—Just as Paris dominates France, so is Buenos Aires the center of the Argentine republic. Indeed, as far as politics, education, business, the fine arts, and other matters of social interest are concerned, Buenos Aires is Argentina.

To this city, with its population of 1,750,000, is flowing a growing stream of immigration from Italy, Spain, Germany, the Near East, Turkey, and even the Orient. In ten years Buenos Aires will probably be the second largest city in the new world. She already houses more Italians than Rome, more Spaniards than Madrid, more Syrians than Beirut and, as an aftermath of the war, expects to receive great additions of Austrians and Germans.

The domination of Buenos Aires, however, is being challenged by such other cities as Rosario, Parana, Cordoba, Mendoza, Bahia Blanca, Santa Fe, and Tucuman. The government is encouraging the settlement of tracts previously given to cattle raising so that what have been sparsely inhabited provinces will soon support permanent agricultural communities. Before many generations, Buenos Aires will be forced by the growing power of the rest of the country to assume a less commanding position.

Strategy today and tomorrow.—Many travelers declare that Argentina at present is marked by an aggressive nationalism which in some of its manifestations becomes almost a blind egotism. A pervading materialism likewise makes religious work difficult. One observer is reported as saying that "here the people are so indifferent to all religions that they have no time to be hostile to any. There is practically religious liberty, authorities and people alike seeming to look upon religious work as an amiable form of insanity."

In the face of this dominance of Buenos Aires, the growth in national pride, and the materialistic atmosphere, any program of advance in the Argentine must take into consideration these elements. Evangelicalism must have a strategy that will provide, in the first place, a national leadership; in the second place, commanding institutions; in the third place, adequate occupation of the nation; and, in the fourth place, occupation of the undeveloped regions as they are settled.

Argentina has about the population of New York state, but is twenty-four times as large in area.

ARGENTINA'S PRESSING PROBLEMS

The rising tide of labor.—It may surprise readers in North America to know that Buenos Aires has probably suffered more from labor troubles since the close of the world war than any other city in the world. Labor conditions have grown critical throughout the Argentine Republic, leading up to the triumph of the radical party at the recent election, with the socialists in second place, and the conservatives that have long been in power relegated to a minor position.

Sovietism is rampant in Argentina today. Not only working men but students and faculties in the universities have largely gone over to the extreme communistic position. The Federacion Obrera Regional Argentina—the labor organization that is generally known by its initials as the F. O. R. A.—now has a membership of more than 300,000, all paying dues. It has carried through successful strikes against the strongest business organizations in the country, such as the railway and steamship lines, and is now undertaking the organization of the peon labor on the great ranches.

In truth, there is plenty in the condition of these workers to inspire action, not only by the F. O. R. A. but by all who are interested in human welfare. The working men on many plantations are virtual slaves. If they attempt to flee, they are hunted like hounds. The contract given them provides that: "Each peon who abandons work without permission of the patron, absenting himself from the establishment, incurs a responsibility for damages, in which case he will be considered as a fugitive and the patron is authorized to pursue him and to compel him to comply with his contract. If the peon loses his time-book, he must submit himself to the data contained in the firm's books. The peon must work every day that the patron designates, Sundays, holidays, or rainy days not excepted, as also he must work at night, if the inclemency of the weather has not permitted him to do so during the day. If for lack of desire, he pretends sickness in order not to work, especially on Sunday, he will pay fifty cents a day for his meals, besides losing his salary."

Labor has proved its power so conclusively in Argentina that any body or movement seeking influence in the future life of the country must bring itself into line with the labor program. The Roman Catholic Church is wholly out of sympathy with this labor movement. As a result, labor is staunchly anti-clerical. It remains to be seen whether Protestantism can win an allegiance that Catholicism has thrown away.

Perils to society.—Argentina is confronted by much the same social problems that are to be found in other Latin lands. Such vices as intemperance, gambling, a double moral standard, and lax regard for the truth are patent to any observer. Woman has until recently held an inferior position and still labors under legal disadvantages that make it impossible for her to administer family property. Through the neglect of education, it is estimated that forty per cent of the people are illiterate.

To deal with these social problems many organizations are being formed. There are three outstanding feminist bodies, one composed of mothers, one of school teachers, and one the National Council of Women, all of which are attacking these evils from their own standpoint. The Woman's Rights Association of Buenos Aires is carrying on a campaign that demands:

1. The repeal of all laws which establish a difference between the two sexes and against woman, in order that the latter be no longer the weakling which she is today, before the law.
2. The right of women to hold public office and to be members of the national and Regional Councils of Education.
3. The establishment of special courts for children and women.
4. The passing of laws for the protection of maternity and for making legitimate all children.
5. The abolition of legal prostitution and the establishment of the white life for both.
6. Equality in wages.
7. Equal political rights.

Heavily laden dock symbolic of Argentina's vigorous commercial activity

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has obtained a strong hold, particularly among women connected with Protestant churches. The roster of organizations, some of them fostered by the evangelical churches and some with Catholic backing, wrestling with these problems, is too long for insertion here.

A spiritual battleground.—It is in the realm of religion that Argentina offers the greatest challenge. The indifference of the intellectual and working classes to the Roman Catholic church has already been cited. Equally, it should be said, are these groups indifferent to the presentation of religion under any auspices whatever they may be.

There are several organizations of Catholic women that show a fanatical attachment to the welfare of that church. The Catholic hierarchy is bestirring itself to rid the clergy of inner decay and to re-establish the influence of the church. In this, it may be said that notable progress is being shown.

But Argentina is drifting, in so far as its controlling elements are concerned, into religious indifference and even atheism. The evangelical churches have, as yet, shown but slight strength wherewith to cope with this exceedingly difficult and dangerous situation.

THE EVANGELICAL PROGRAM

Occupying the field.—In this tremendous expanse of territory, there are working nine main evangelical bodies besides the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of these, two confine their efforts very largely to the small English-speaking communities that are to be found scattered throughout the country. Several hold themselves rigidly to a program of preaching only.

With one body, the Disciples of Christ, it has been possible for the Methodist

Our Girls' School at Buenos Aires builds strong bodies as well as alert minds and spirits

Episcopal Church to unite for various enterprises. A delimitation of territory has prevented overlapping of the work of these two churches and should insure much more rapid occupation of the country.

Methodist responsibility.—The responsibility of the Methodist Episcopal Church is larger than that of any other evangelical society. At the present time, its work is almost equal to that of all other missions combined.

Although the Methodist Episcopal Church has been able to organize four districts in Argentina, and other evangelical bodies have pushed their way into other communities, the occupation of the field can not be said to have passed the initial stage.

Unoccupied territory.—There are, as yet, few churches in Buenos Aires of any particular importance. There are large cities that contain no Protestant congregations.

In 1917, the Executive Secretary of the Committee on Co-operation in Latin America testified that: "If all the missionaries, preachers, teachers, and other evangelical workers, native and foreign, were placed in the province of Buenos Aires there would be only one for each 6,500 people. In Buenos Aires, with 1,700,000, there are fewer than twenty churches and halls for Spanish-speaking services. In Bahia Blanca, with 100,000 people, there is one resident Protestant minister, and there are no teachers. In the province of Mendoza, San Juan and San Luis, with 457,584 inhabitants, there are five ordained ministers and a few volunteer helpers, with eight churches. The country districts, from which we draw most of our ministers, are practically unreached in Argentina. And if we think of the unreached classes of people, space would hardly permit of their mention."

METHODISM'S PRESENT WORK

Successful institutions.—The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church really began in labors among the English-speaking population of Buenos Aires. This work remains important and should be developed. It is self-supporting.

In the course of the years, however, growth has been almost exclusively in the direction of the Spanish-speaking population. There are today thirty-four churches, seventy-nine Sunday schools, a Bible Training School, a secondary school in Buenos Aires, an agricultural training school, a group of primary schools in Buenos Aires, an orphanage at Mercedes, primary schools for boys and girls in Rosario, and a primary school in San Eduardo.

Ward institute.—More public attention is being given to the American College and Ward Commercial Institute than to any other of these enterprises. Here, where the co-operation of the Disciples of Christ has been secured in order to place before the Argentine capital an object lesson in Christian education, there is a flourishing secondary school, with a three-year commercial course. The Centenary has made possible the enlargement of a fine plant on one of the main avenues of Buenos Aires. The school has been filled to capacity from the opening day.

Christian literature.—As in all Latin American countries, the use of the printed page is of increasing importance in the Protestant program. In Argentina the church has shown itself strong enough to conduct its own publishing house and distribute its own weekly El Estandarte Evangelico, on a self-supporting basis. The success of this enterprise is one more evidence of the inherent power of the church in a Latin land.

A devoted membership.—There are 7,250 members in the Methodist Episcopal Church in the bounds of the Eastern South America Conference! (This conference includes the work in Uruguay as well as in Argentina.) This may seem like a small group with which to face the problem of so large a land but the devotion of these Methodists is shown by the fact that, whereas the budget for educational work has called for $95,000 yearly, the church in South America has contributed $76,000 of this amount; and whereas the budget for evangelistic work has required $203,000, the Methodists on the field have contributed $149,000, while they have carried the entire $50,000 that represents the expense of the publishing house. In other words, the Methodists of Eastern South America are now giving an average of $21.00 per member for evangelistic work and an average of $38.00 for all purposes! This will compare favorably with the giving of Methodists in any part of the world and indicates that there has already been gathered in Argentina a nucleus about which can grow a mighty evangelical church.

THE LINE OF ADVANCE

Raising up leaders.—Bishop W. F. Oldham has written what he declares to be his “abiding word to Methodism” concerning the problems that face the church in Argentina. First place he gives to the need of a better-trained ministry. “This is a people,” he says, “wonderfully responsive to preaching that is adequate in material and form, while there is perhaps less patience with poor preaching than even with our impatient people at home. What we need, therefore, is a higher order of prepared men to command that hearing without which the gospel message can not hope to be widely spread.”

In the face of this need, the importance can be seen of continuing the Bible Training School at Buenos Aires, and of starting the work of the projected Union Theological Seminary at Montevideo, which is to offer the highest type of post-graduate work to the evangelical ministerial candidates of all South America.

The training school in Buenos Aires is conducted in company with the Disciples of Christ, although five-sixths of the students enrolled are prospective ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church. There will long be need for such a school to furnish the major portion of the Argentine ministry. The school in Montevideo is expected to give instruction only to those university graduates who have given signs of ability to render extraordinary service.

Adequate churches.—Argentina, with its well-planned cities, presents the problem of church edifices in a more pressing form than the other Latin countries.

“There can never be sufficient emphasis,” declares Bishop Oldham, “on the statement that people of cultivation and social position can not be induced into religious services or gatherings of any kind in poorly located and furnished halls. Accustomed to the stately and ornately furnished buildings of the Roman Church, men and women of cultivation can not be induced by any possible means to enter ill-favored buildings.

“Methodism must heed the important need by the expenditure of large sums of money to provide adequate churches. In every case the existing local congregations will provide a far larger proportion of the expenses than one who knows their circumstances would estimate. And it can safely be said that such churches once built will soon hold self-supporting congregations, carrying not only their own local expenses but helping to send the gospel to other sections of their country.”

A sample statement.—As one example of many that might be cited, consider the proposal for the building of Third Church, Buenos Aires:

“The Third Church, Buenos Aires, is in the very heart of the city and presents the always pathetic sight of a Methodist attempt to evangelize a community of cultivated tastes through advance located in an inadequate hall, which at best can only hold 150 persons, without separate rooms for Sunday school or young people's activities of any kind. For years this gallant group has held its own, but it is worse than foolish to keep on with it, using so much energy, when with altered conditions so much larger results could be obtained. These conditions are: first, to move on to a main street; second, to erect a commodious, attractive, but simple church and Sunday-school rooms. Land is expensive and about one-half the total expense incurred will be in purchasing it. The amount that the congregation is collecting excites the admiration of all who know their circumstances! The total amount required is $38,500. Local sources will provide $8,500."

Pupils in our day school at Edwards

A socialized program.—Argentina is responding in an astonishing way to the first attempt at social service by the evangelical forces.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has in its Boca Mission in Buenos Aires given an object lesson in the possibilities of institutional work. The ministries of this widely known mission are mainly to the seamen and workers along the waterfront of the Argentine capital. Only a lack of proper equipment has kept this from being one of the outstanding successes in institutional work in any land. Other social agencies are to be extended and a well-planned system of medical relief for the poor is to be put into effect, especially outside of the larger cities.

Bishop Oldham, whose experience has touched India, Malaysia, and the general work of the church through his service as Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, writes that "If anywhere in the world will be found response to such programs, it will be found here. In this case, once the initial expense is made, a large measure of self-support may speedily be looked for. All these clamant needs can be supplied for a total sum not exceeding the amount originally promised by the Centenary, and this because we are finding the local response greater than our estimates, fantastical as those estimates seemed when first made."

Entering the empty spaces.—A single district of the Eastern South America Conference contains more than 283,000 square miles of territory (more than all the state of Texas) with a population of 2,500,000. Another district embraces 185,000 square miles (more than four times larger than Ohio) with only 621,500 people. In still another district, with a territory more than ten times as large as that of Pennsylvania, there are but 920,000 people.

Of the work in all these sections the resident bishop has to write: "Little is being done. Our undertakings are so small that as yet they can scarcely be said to be touching the fringes of the situation. The insistent call is for primary schools, district nurses, itinerating dispensaries and a gospel tent for itinerating through all the spring and summer, with a plentiful use of tracts."

The plans now adopted provide for a fit entrance into these new portions just as fast as funds are made available. Today, with the expansive spirit common to pioneer communities, these towns and cities welcome the evangelical approach. It is possible to secure satisfactory sites for the work that may not be available a few years hence, and a large amount of local support is in sight from the start. Christian wisdom calls for advance into these fields in this time of opportunity.

The need.—In order in any sense to discharge the obligations of Methodism in Argentina, the church has approved the following program¹ for 1925:

URUGUAY

A FORWARD-LOOKING NATION

Progressive Uruguay.—As Geneva was once the intellectual center of Europe, so Montevideo, the capital of Uruguay, smallest of the countries of South America, bids fair to become the intellectual capital of that continent. South America is just moving into a period of destiny. And not only in education, but in dealing with almost every other problem that confronts the Latin republics, Uruguay is pointing the way.

Uruguay is as much dominated by Montevideo, whose 400,000 people are a third of the population, as is Argentina by Buenos Aires. The development of the interior has scarcely begun, although there are small cities, such as Durazno and Trinidad, with 20,000 people in them. At present it is possible largely to concentrate attention upon the capital, but the certain development of the rest of the country requires an adequate occupation of other centers as well.

Where labor rules.—The labor troubles of other South American countries have not greatly disturbed Uruguay, because labor is already in control. The government is avowedly socialistic in tendency, and the national constitution adopted in 1917 is remarkably progressive in its attitude upon industrial issues.

There is probably no other government in the world, for example, where, according to law, a workman has to be paid while he is on strike. The compensation laws protecting workmen injured in industry provide payment even when the accident is the result of negligence. The nation is probably the most socialistic in either of the Americas.

Votes for women.—It is not surprising, therefore, to find a strong feminist movement in Uruguay. The only woman's university in South America stands in Montevideo. The headquarters of the Continental Temperance Society, a woman's movement, are in the same city. And the agitation for votes for women seems likely to attain its end.

Educational emphasis.—Uruguay boasts that she has the lowest rate of illiteracy in South America. This is due to an educational program that absorbs a larger percentage of the national budget than in any other country on that continent. So complete is the government system of grammar schools that it is unnecessary for the church to maintain schools of that grade, save in a few places where exceptional conditions obtain.

A continental center.—It is as a sort of center for the movements that affect South America as a whole that Uruguay is attracting prominence. Mention has been made of the way in which the temperance cause has made its headquarters in Montevideo. The international student organization of South America has also placed its offices in that city. The South American headquarters of the Young Men's Christian Association will be found there. The Catholic church is reported to be sending priests from all parts of Latin America to Montevideo for final training. The office of the educational secretary for the united Protestants of the continent has been placed there. Some day the Union Theological Seminary, which is to provide the finest Protestant ministerial training in South America, will be located in this center.

The religious situation.—Reports concerning the religious situation in Uruguay conflict. While Protestant work, especially that of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is flourishing, it cannot be denied that dominant political elements are strongly anti-religious.

By the constitution of 1917 church and state have been separated. In many ways this has been a good thing for the Catholic church, since the necessity of providing for its own support has purified and invigorated that body. The Catholic party today contains many strong men. The doors before the evangelicals, however, seem wide open.

THE RESPONSE TO METHODISM

How the field is occupied.—While most of the people of Uruguay have lost confidence in religion as embodied in an institution, they have proved peculiarly accessible to religion preached as a personal experience and expressed through service.

The response to the efforts of the Methodist Episcopal Church has been remarkable. It is generally conceded that one Methodist congregation is the strongest Protestant body of any kind in Latin America. There are now twelve circuits, with many preaching points. The main population centers of the country are occupied. Methodist work is much more extensive than the combined work of all other Protestant forces. The Methodist Episcopal Church must face responsibility for the evangelization of about four-fifths of Uruguay.

An outstanding church.—Mention Methodism in Uruguay and the McCabe Memorial Church, Montevideo, immediately comes to mind. Here, in the finest plant occupied by a Spanish-speaking Protestant congregation in Latin America, evangelicalism is making a deep impression. Doctors, lawyers, university professors, merchants, bankers, and many other callings are represented in this wholly self-supporting church. Great liberality for benevolent purposes is shown, while improvement of the local equipment goes on continually. A varied institutional work goes hand in hand here with an aggressive evangelistic appeal.

Central Methodist Episcopal Church,
Montevideo, Uruguay

In South America's stockyards.—Equal success is meeting the Pan-American Institute in the Cerro district of Montevideo. This is the stockyards section, and is filled with the workers of the Swift and Armour plants. The Pan-American Institute puts on an evangelistic, educational, and medical program that runs seven days and nights a week. Practically no other religious work of any kind is being done among these 15,000 people, who show their appreciation by bearing more than half the budget. As this is a young work, it is possible in time it may become self-supporting, something that is true of few institutional plants in the world.

Two noted schools.—The higher educational work under Methodist auspices is notably successful. In a country that prides itself on its standards of education, the high school for girls conducted by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, Crandon Hall, is generally ranked in the first grade.

The North American Academy, the higher school for boys carried on by the Board of Foreign Missions, is rapidly winning distinction. The crowded classrooms and large budget borne by local resources testify to the high standing of this school.

If there were space, report might be made of much other work in Uruguay. It must suffice to say that in all South America there is no country where the work is more solidly planted, nor anywhere is better hope for a future of large influence.

The immediate need.—As it is impossible to separate the administration of work in the Argentine Republic and Uruguay, since both are included in the Eastern South America Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with district lines in some cases crossing national boundaries, the approved program for both countries will be found in the section devoted to Argentina.

In 1917-1918 I studied the history of all the races of the earth, and became convinced that the sole solution of the evil of the world is the transformation of human souls, that this cannot be brought about except by means of religion, and that the most perfect and suitable is that taught by Christ.

GIOVANNI PAPINI

EUROPE AND NORTH AFRICA

THE CONTINENT WITH DIVERSE PROBLEMS

When the Peace Conference attempted to settle the problems of Europe on the basis of racial and economic interests, it plunged into a task from which it was unable to extricate itself successfully. The church, facing the religious problems of the same continent, finds itself dealing with questions as intricate and difficult of solution as any that confronted the negotiators at Versailles.

The program of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Europe is not a mechanical one. It has not been worked out on paper and then imposed upon the people involved. It has grown up as needs have been expressed by these people themselves and has been tested out carefully in action.

There are six main divisions in the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Europe. Briefly, these divisions are:

THE LATIN PEOPLES

The religious problem presented by the Latin countries is one of the most difficult. In Italy, France, and Spain the Methodist Episcopal Church has attempted to deal with it by placing increasing emphasis upon a proper culture for youth while at the same time carrying forward its evangelistic program. The rearing of a Protestant younger generation looks to future, more than to present, power.

THE BALKANS

Into the southeastern corner of Europe have been flung Mohammedans, Greek Catholics, Roman Catholics, Jews, Free Thinkers, and Protestants. To insure future peace in this storm center a solution of the resulting religious problem is as much needed as anything. Methodist work is being conducted in Bulgaria and Yugoslavia, including Macedonia.

THE PROTESTANT PEOPLES

The healthy Methodist Episcopal churches that have sprung up among the Protestant peoples of Europe have all come, not as a result of any planning in America, but in response to evangelistic labors carried on by natives of these lands converted in other Methodist centers. Had it not been for the war, the work in Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Germany, and Switzerland would probably have been self-supporting by this time. For purposes of easy classification, in the following pages, the description of work in Austria and Hungary, which was planted from Germany, will be found listed under the head of the Protestant peoples.

RUSSIA

This great land remains a problem by itself. So challenging are the opportunities that it is clear that the Methodist Episcopal Church must undertake a greatly enlarged program.

THE BALTIC REPUBLICS

The three small states that have been placed as buffers between Russia and western Europe have been the scene of Methodist work for many years. A strong church is coming into being in each of them.

THE MOHAMMEDAN PEOPLES

While not in Europe, the work in North Africa has been attached to that in Europe for purposes of administration. Tunisia, Algeria, Tripoli, Cyrenaica, Morocco—the field of Methodist labor among the Mohammedans of North Africa—are all under the political control of European states. They are, however, closely linked to the rest of Africa, because they provide the base from which Islam is advancing against Central Africa.

PLANS FOR ADVANCE

The Methodist Episcopal Church at present has established residences for bishops in Zurich, Copenhagen, and Paris. The immediate program as approved for work of a nature affecting Europe as a whole is as follows:

BATTLING FOR THE SPIRITUAL LIFE OF EUROPE

Is France Catholic?—France is a Latin nation. Her history has been interwoven with that of the papacy. Her land is studded with hundreds of Roman Catholic churches and other institutions. She supports seventeen archbishops, sixty-eight bishops, and 51,000 Catholic clergy of other ranks.

Outwardly, this suggests a Catholic country. Nor can it be denied that there has been, since the close of the World War, a lessening of the enmity between the French government and the Vatican, at the same time when, in some places, a resurgence of Catholic piety has been reported.

The diplomacy of an astute Pope and of a foreign office seeking every possible source of continental support has led to the first. The after-effect of the war, coupled with admiration for the heroism displayed by hundreds of priests, has contributed largely to the second.

But the question is not yet answered. Is France Catholic?

Politically, no. Diplomatic flirtations may be in progress, but it is unthinkable that any French government now possible would re-establish the status that existed before 1905, when church and state were separated.

Culturally, no. That there are large Roman Catholic deposits in the culture of France will not be questioned, but for more than a hundred years the men who have been molding French thought have not, in the main, been sons of the church.

Religiously, no. In this realm the Catholic interest is larger than in any other. But even here the influence must be recognized of French Protestantism, living unbrokenly to this hour despite St. Bartholomew's Eve and all other disadvantage.

The man who sees France just as a Catholic country does not see France.

Irreligion and materialism.—The truth is that the fight which an eager evangelicalism must wage in France today is not so much with a tradition-bound Catholicism as with irreligion and materialism. Millions of Frenchmen, including many of the ruling minds, pride themselves upon their superiority to all religion, their devotion to a "reality" that confines itself to the affairs of the immediate moment.

The struggle in France is not with a distorted conception of the worship of God, but with a refusal to worship God at all. Religion is to millions a myth outworn. And since France is the leading nation on the continent of Europe, with the standards of culture for the Latins, the Balkans, the Poles, and the people of Central Europe largely in her keeping, the battle in this republic is really a struggle for the spiritual life of Europe.

It is not a struggle between varying degrees of spiritual life. It is a struggle to maintain any spiritual life at all.

French Protestantism.—Tribute must be paid the various branches of French Protestantism for the manner in which the truths of the reformation, as they found their incarnation in that great Frenchman, John Calvin, have been kept alive.

The last edition of the Statesman's Year Book states that there are about a million Protestants in France. The Protestants themselves, at the close of the war, claimed only about 600,000 communicants, with 1,200 churches. The addition of Alsace and Lorraine increased this enumeration by about 275,000.

French Protestantism is divided between Reformed, Lutheran, Baptist, Wesleyan, and Methodist Episcopal churches, the McAll Mission, and the Salvation Army. A good measure of the vigor of the French Protestant bodies is to be found in the fact that, at the outbreak of the war, despite their slender resources, they supported 119 foreign missionaries, mainly in Central Africa, with an annual missionary expenditure of $190,000. French Protestantism has a proud history.

What Methodism has to offer.—The Methodist Episcopal Church entered France in 1907. During the years before the World War the principal attempt was to evangelize the mountainous regions of Savoy, lying in the enclave between the work already established in Switzerland and that in Italy. The region had been badly neglected from a Protestant standpoint, and the results of the evangelistic work attempted were encouraging.

While the war was in progress, with pastors and parishioners on the firing line, little more could be done than to hold the work together. Now the Methodist Episcopal Church is giving France proof of a continuing interest on the part of the Protestant countries in the fortunes of Protestantism in France. It is also setting up a type of combined evangelistic and social service that may induce a new and more effective method in all French Protestantism.

THE STRATEGY OF THE METHODIST OCCUPATION

Where the church is working.—There are twenty-three pastoral charges in the France Mission Conference, including Paris, Marseilles, Lyons, Toulon, Grenoble, Chamberry, Chateau Thierry, Tre-voux, Albertville, and Grasse.

There are also schools or homes at Charvieu, Ecully, Cannes, and Gennevilliers, in addition to some of the places already named.

It will be seen that the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church has thus expanded outside the boundaries at first conceived for it. In large measure, this is a result of the war.

The effect of the war.—Before the war the Methodist Episcopal Church in France was a modest agency, mainly at work in the mountains of Savoy.

After the war the Methodist Episcopal Church in France is a social agency, attempting at many points to heal some of the wounds inflicted by that mastodonic conflict.

Before the war the Methodist Episcopal Church in France had its eyes fixed mainly upon the conversion of adults. After the war the Methodist Episcopal Church in France is fixing its eyes largely upon the conservation of children. In large measure, the present work can be told in terms of children (mainly orphans) and young people.

War reconstruction.—Hardly had the guns cooled before the Centenary, working through its War Reconstruction Fund, made it possible for the Methodist Episcopal Church to move to the help of France. Thirty villages on the Marne were turned over to Methodist workers for rehabilitation, and prompt and large contributions were made to aid in the rebuilding and recovery of strength of the historic churches.

In Chateau Thierry, a few hundred feet from the bridge where American marines stopped the last desperate German advance on Paris, the memorial was opened which keeps firm, through a well-rounded social program, the bond there forged between America and France.

All this, and more, was done with no other thought than that of helpfulness. In the providence of God the Methodist Episcopal Church had funds wherewith to help; action therefore followed. But one result has been a widespread gratitude on the part of many French folk which has made ready a welcome in many places for other features of the work.

Schools and orphanages.—Space does not permit a description of the home at Charvieu, with its farm school, and its eighty boys housed in the fine plant that the Centenary has erected. The orphanage at

Domestic science is taught at our orphanage in Grenoble

Champs Fleury cares for about sixty girls, many of whom entirely lost track of their families during the war. In Grenoble the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has a fine home and school for girls.

Ultimately, these orphanages, now demanded to care for the victims of the war, will be developed into high grade schools.

Other lines of work.—Evangelistic work of the Methodist type is proving successful. At the area headquarters in Paris, located in the university quarter, a chapel has been erected, where good congregations are being gathered; and a building has been provided for a varied type of social work. In Lyons a former moving picture palace has been transformed into a social center that is influencing the entire section of the city in which it is located.

Of significance in connection with the stress laid upon work for children and young people is the development in Sunday-school methods. A few years ago there were no literature supplies, and the schools were nothing more than catechistical classes. Today there is a modern and rapidly growing Sunday-school work in all Methodist centers.

Some measure of the power of French Methodism may be caught in these facts: In 1909 there were only twenty-four church members; at the end of 1920 there were 971. In 1909 there were only three Sunday schools; in 1920 there were twenty-four. In 1909 only twenty-five French children studied the Bible in Methodist Sunday schools; by 1920 more than 1,800 did so.

What might be called a socialized evangelism distinguishes the whole work of the Methodist Episcopal Church in France.

SPAIN

A LAND IN PROSPECT

A tale of two schools.—The Methodist Episcopal Church has entered Spain. Count that as a Centenary achievement. The entrance has not been spectacular. There are probably Spaniards who do not know that the Methodist Episcopal Church is among them. But the day is coming when they will.

When Methodism, after careful investigation, entered Spain, it did so by means of two schools. Both had been established for years, had won the confidence of their communities, and afforded a fine constituency with which to begin work.

The first of these schools is the Model School for Boys in Alicante, a city on the southeast coast. Founded by the Rev. Francisco Albrecias, who had been educated in Switzerland and had labored for years as a Bible Society inspector, the school has won a wide reputation. Since 1919, when it was taken over by the Board of Foreign Missions, the enrolment in the day school has jumped from about 200 to more than 500. A Sunday school gathers more than 700 children each week in the largest Spanish-speaking Sunday school in the world.

The second school is at Seville, and has been known for years as the Evangelical School. Formerly supported by private parties, many of them now deceased, the school has taken on new vigor in its new relation as one of the bases for Methodist work in Spain. In fact, its enrolment mounted so high that the bars had to be put up, in order to keep the school within the limits made necessary by its present curtailed equipment.

All this in Spain, where the public schools offer freely what these schools are forced to charge fees to possess, and where the enrolment of a child in the Protestant school may lead to the parent's loss of position or the family's social ostracism!

What Spain is today.—Spain is having a hard time finding her place in the company of modern European states. The monarchy survives, supported by the army, and the two in turn find in the church their hope of a continuing conservatism.

But progressive movements in other parts of the continent are felt below the Pyrenees. The general public is becoming more and more exasperated with the military adventures that have led to such costs in blood and treasure, with so little in return, in Morocco. The stability of the state is gradually vanishing. A new day may come in Spain at any time.

Facing the future.—There is already a measure of religious tolerance in Spain, although it is less than that in other Latin countries. But it was possible for the 200 small Protestant congregations to unite in an open and national congress in Madrid in 1919. To aid in securing this assembly the Board of Foreign Missions made a generous contribution. The agitation for complete freedom of worship is constantly gathering strength.

It takes no prophet to see that the triumph of new forces in Spain cannot be much longer delayed. This is, therefore, the best of all periods for Protestants to be planting their stakes, in order that they may be ready for aggressive advance the moment the control of Catholicism is loosened.

The Methodist Episcopal Church feels sure that, by beginning among the children, it is doing the sort of foundation work that will make possible a stable church, with true evangelical ideals deeply inbred, in the larger days to come. In those days the Methodist program will be enlarged. For the present the methods of work will be continued on the successful basis of the past three years.

ITALY

THE HEART OF THE LATIN WORLD

All roads lead to Rome.—The fascination of Italy abides, especially in the Latin world. The great Polish novelist, Sienkiewicz, declared that every Latin has two fatherlands, the one in which he is born and Italy. And if travelers will gather from all the earth in the peninsula that once ruled the West, drawn by the magnetism of its past, how great must be the impress made upon the mind that traces its culture to this source!

The Latin is no more confined to the northern shore of the Mediterranean. As his numbers have increased (there are about 170,000,000 Latins today) he has spread through the world, until he is to be found dominating South America, in force in large portions of North America and planting great colonies in Africa. The spiritual condition of Italy therefore becomes of vastly more moment than as if it affected merely one European peninsula.

A crucible of history.—Terrific has been the struggle for the control of Italy. The dark, confused years following the fall of the Roman empire are familiar. The city-republics of the Middle Ages must be carefully studied by every student of political institutions. The emergence of the papacy as a temporal power, and the blighting effect of its rule, is the most curious phenomenon in Western religious history.

It took Italy from the time of the Cæsars to that of Mazzini and Garibaldi to win back control of her own life. And the makers of modern Italy—Mazzini, Garibaldi, Cavour, Victor Emmanuel I—had first to defy the papacy before they could unite the country as a limited monarchy.

Ostensibly the struggle closed in 1870 when Victor Emmanuel was crowned in Rome, and the pope became "the prisoner of the Vatican." In fact, the struggle continues. It played its part in hampering Italy's armies during the World War. It is at work today.

A hidden tomorrow.—Few observers would be so brave as to predict Italy's political future. At the close of the World War it seemed that communism might engulf the land immediately. The monarchy is still admittedly in a precarious position. At present, a reaction, to which has been given the name of Fascism, has put down all socialistic agitation ruthlessly. This dictatorship—for such it is—may continue in power for some time, counting upon the weariness of the people and their desire for order at any price. It is closely allied with the Vatican. On the other hand, its repressions may bring about revolt at any time.

Any enterprise in Italy, therefore, must work today in an environment far from stable. There is small hint as to what tomorrow's conditions may be. But just because this is such a period of flux, it is a time when forces that would exert a molding influence upon Italy's future must press their efforts.

A SPIRITUAL BATTLEGROUND

"Semper idem."—It is the boast of the Roman Catholic Church that she never changes. History shows many changes that have come within her life during the centuries, but it is, alas, true that, in spirit, the church has hardly changed since the Middle Ages. Some of her doctrines, such as that of papal infallibility, are of recent promulgation. But her mind has scarcely altered since the days of Thomas Aquinas.

The challenge to freedom.—It is just this unchangeableness in which the Roman Church glories that has reduced its influence among many Italians to the vanishing point. To be sure, in this day of unrest, there is something attractive about any institution that proclaims its opposition to change. But, to the thinker, it soon becomes clear that freedom requires growth. Premier Mussolini states that his Fascisti have not hesitated to tread upon the prostrate body of freedom, nor will they hesitate to do so again, should change be bruited. It is no wonder that a party with such a platform can bring about a rapprochement with the Vatican. At the same time, it makes more inevitable the final divorcement between liberal elements in Italy and the Roman Church. Before long, even the nominal adherence that has been maintained by many liberals will become impossible.

The need for Protestantism.—Whatever present conditions, some form of liberalism is bound finally to triumph in Europe. If this triumph finds Italy's liberals completely separated from the Roman Church, and without other spiritual allegiance, the religious situation throughout the Latin world will be most serious. Apparently, the Roman Church tried to provide for this contingency at the close of the World War, when it launched its Popular Party with a program calling for far-reaching social and political reforms. But the temptation to make common cause with the immediate Fascist despotism has been too strong, and the proposal of an alliance between a progressive political order and a medieval church is now seen to be empty words.

Liberal Italy is bound to discover that it cannot trust its future to any program dictated from the Vatican. It knows that the 272 bishops, archbishops and cardinals, the 67,147 priests, the 45,253 monks who inhabit this country no larger than Colorado are, with only a few exceptions, agents of a reactionary order. It must, for this reason, either find a form of Christianity compatible with a free, progressive state, or it will reject all religion.

Too largely, the choice of Italy's liberals has swung toward the latter of these alternatives. To protect the Latin world, and the rest of the world, against this catastrophe, Protestantism is called upon to attempt to set new religious ideals before Italian eyes.

METHODISM IN ITALY

In the path of Victor Emmanuel.—It was on the twentieth of September, 1870, that the armies of Victor Emmanuel I breached the walls of Rome, brought to an end the pope's temporal sway, and proclaimed a united, free Italy. In the same year the Methodist Episcopal Church resolved to open the work in the country. Five years later there was a Methodist work in Rome. In 1893 Methodist headquarters were erected on the Via Venti Settembre—the Street of the Twentieth of September! Historically and symbolically, free Italy and Methodism have been closely connected.

Planting the church.—From the beginning, the attempt was to bring forth an Italian church. During all the years there has scarcely ever been a time when there were more than two, and sometimes only one, American member of the Italy Conference. Schools, philanthropic institutions, periodicals—all have been conducted worthily by Italian Methodists.

While much has been reported concerning Methodist work in Rome, it must not be thought that this bounds the enterprise in Italy. Before the World War, the Methodist Episcopal Church had been planted in ninety-six preaching places. (A few of these were congregations of Italians resident in Switzerland.) The Boys' Industrial School in Venice had attracted wide attention, while to the Crandon Institute, conducted by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and the school for boys, conducted by the Board of Foreign Missions, in Rome, hundreds of the finest of the youth of Italy came for education. The theological seminary, also conducted in Rome, provided a trained ministry.

What the Centenary has done.—During the World War the church in Italy suffered heavily. Preachers and laymen were called into the ranks, and suffered there in common with the rest of Italy. Churches in the northern part of the country, in the path of invading armies, were destroyed.

Methodist Headquarters in Rome

But with the return of peace, the Methodist Episcopal Church immediately entered upon a larger day. Fifty-three new workers were added, and 26,000 people aided with food, clothing, or money.

Bible depots were opened in Syracuse, Reggio, Pozzuoli, and Rome. Today we have schools in Pola, Trent, Florence, Pistoia, Pisa, Terni, Spinazzola, Naples, and Rome. Additional property has been purchased in Venice; new property in Coritzia, Florence, Trent, Pisa, Pistoia, Naples, Scicli, and Rome; improvements in Turin. In Genoa, Milan, and Reggio Calabria property was purchased upon which there will later be buildings erected.

THE PRESENT PROGRAM

Monte Mario.—The removal of the Collegio Internazionale from the crowded headquarters building on the Via Venti Settembre to a site on Monte Mario, a part of the Janiculum hill, overlooking Rome and the Mediterranean, has awakened interest throughout Italy. For a time it seemed that permission might be withheld for the erection of the buildings planned. Buildings that were on the site when purchased have been remodeled, however, and the school is in operation there. It is confidently expected that there will be no final hindrance placed in the way of developing a free institution of higher learning.

The school is well called "international." In its present student body are students from Albania, Montenegro, Yugo-Slavia, Hungary, Africa, Switzerland, Spain, Latin America, and the United States. It has already graduated more than 1,200 students, many of whom occupy positions of leadership in many realms of Italian life. More than forty members of the Italy Conference are products of the school that is now on Monte Mario. (For picture of one of the new buildings, see page 177.)

"To serve the present age."—The motto of the World Service Program of the Methodist Episcopal Church well expresses the spirit of present-day Italian Methodism. Not only on Monte Mario, but in many other places and ways, the church is trying to serve Italy. In Naples, for example, the Casa Materna has been moved to a new location, where one of Methodism's largest orphanages looks after helpless children. The property outgrown has been turned into a social center, with a day nursery, a clinic, a recreation center, and an emigration bureau.

This development of centers in which help may be given those who hope to emigrate to the United States is of great value. America's laws now are so stringent that, unless prospective immigrants are carefully instructed, they may spend all their available funds upon a fruitless trip across the ocean. At these stations in Italy the church attempts to forge the first link in the chain of service that shall later bind the immigrant to the church in the United States.

A Catholic revival.—Newspaper reports, and apparently official statements, have declared that, along with the present increase in Catholic political power in Italy, there has been planned a campaign especially directed against the Methodists in Italy. The very plan bespeaks the reality of Methodist success. It seems clear, however, that this campaign is to take the form of Catholic reproduction of Methodist forms of social service, which will hardly hurt the Methodists, and will be a welcome help in Italy.

The immediate need.—In the critical condition in which the work in Italy now stands, the Methodist Episcopal Church has authorized this program for 1925:

YUGO-SLAVIA

IN EUROPE'S STORM CENTER

A shot heard 'round the world.—On a July morning in the city of Sarejevo, capital of the province of Bosnia, a Serbian student fired at an Austrian archduke and his wife. Before the final echo of those shots had died away, ten million men were dead on the field of battle, other millions were crippled, others homeless, others hungry, and the world had been brought to a crisis in its civilization. So far-reaching can be the effects of trouble in the Balkans.

The Balkans after the war.—The map of the Balkans has been radically altered by the World War. Out of the dismemberment of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the disappearance of Montenegro, the defeat of Turkey and Bulgaria, there has emerged the kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, or, as it is more familiarly known, Yugo-Slavia.

There must be about five and a half million people in this territory, although political conditions are still so unsettled that an official census is impossible. They represent a strange mixture of peoples, with the races named in the kingdom's title naturally in the majority. It will be some time before these can be welded into true natural unity, as is shown by the present agitation for independence in Croatia, and the refusal of Croat deputies to sit in the national legislature.

Yet the importance of stability for this Balkan kingdom can not be minimized. "A foreigner in the Balkans," wrote a recent observer, "in the city of Belgrade, about equidistant from seven turbulent borders, rests his security on the best bet in sight, and that the sagacity and firmness of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes." In the midst of the clashing forces in southwestern Europe, the survival of Yugo-Slavia, or of some well-

Strategic advance.—The church enters Yugo-Slavia because it has a definite and needed contribution to this work of building a lasting community. In the breakup of nations, religious bonds have been greatly loosened. Much of the religious ferment that is being felt in Bohemia has crossed the border into Yugo-Slavia. The Greek Orthodox Church is shaken to its foundations by events in Russia, Greece, and the Near East. Even Islam has attempted a revolution in its government.

Conditions are plastic in the Balkans. There is an enormous amount of the sort of human need that calls for the service of Good Samaritans from whatever source they may come. There is much seeking after a more searching personal and more socially uplifting type of religion. The Roman Catholic Church is straining every nerve to take advantage of this opportunity. In the providence of God it happens that the Methodist Episcopal Church is called upon to bear the major share of the Protestant advance into the same region.

THE CHURCH IN YUGO-SLAVIA

The religious situation.—Some idea of the racial, as well as the religious mixture to be found in the Balkans is given by the report that, on the Novi Sad district of the Yugo-Slavia Mission, there are about 900,000 Slavs, 450,000 Germans, and 450,000 Hungarians and Jews, while on the Strumitza

District there are very few Catholics or Protestants, but 300,000 Mohammedans and 450,000 Serb, Bulgarian, and Greek members of the Orthodox Church; and on the Zagreb district the majority are Roman Catholics, with only a few Orthodox communicants.

Consolidating the Methodist line.—Across the heterogeneous kingdom the Methodist Episcopal Church has begun to spread its forces. In this statement the emphasis must be placed on the word "begun," because the work of the church in Yugo-Slavia is still largely in a process of becoming. Adequate occupation of this vital territory requires a program much larger than that now possible, but the main centers of work have already been occupied.

As suggested there are three districts in the Methodist Episcopal field. North of the Save River, mostly in the territory of old Hungary, north of Belgrade, in the richest farming country in Yugo-Slavia, lies the Novi Sad district. The part of old Macedonia that borders Greece on the south, Albania on the west, Bulgaria on the east and unites with the older Serbia on the north, comprises the Strumitza district. The provinces of Croatia and Slovenia will form the Zagreb district, when this unit is organized. A glance at the map will show how complete is this occupation of territory.

Work welcomed and supported.—Officials of the state, and in some instances leaders in the Orthodox Church, have shown their approval of the type of service being rendered by the Methodist Episcopal Church. The Serbian bishop in Novi Sad has commended the work being done in the school for girls there. The utmost cordiality has been shown by the Orthodox bishop in Strumitza. In the province of Croatia, which it is proposed to enter, the plans have the warm approval of the government.

Social work, which includes such institutions as the Children's and Mothers' Home at Sarajevo, the social center and clinic at Belgrade, the social clubs at Novi Sad, Stari Becej, and Veliki Bechkerek, the girls' school at Monastir, and the training school for girls at Novi Sad, has met a response that has shown its need. For example, the schools mentioned are overcrowded, although schools conducted by Protestant bodies in years before the war found it impossible to attract a constituency.

The request has come from official quarters to extend the Methodist type of educational work to peasant boys and girls who are not now being reached. The government has asked the Methodist Episcopal Church to conduct an agricultural and industrial training school, but funds have not been sufficient. However, it is plain that this is a type of education of vast importance, for the future lies with the farmers.

AN ADEQUATE PROGRAM

The evangelistic advance.—The Methodist Episcopal Church can not fool with the situation in Yugo-Slavia. Either it will do the work that there is a chance to do there in the name of a free, modern, evangelical church, or it will lose its chance and might as well withdraw. The program that the church is being asked to support is not extravagant. It is extremely conservative.

The outstanding feature in the advance program for evangelistic work is the occupation of the province of Croatia, with later occupation of Slovenia. In both provinces there have been assurances given of support, and the government will favor the move.

Next in importance, or perhaps of equal importance, is the placing of the work in Belgrade in a position to command the attention of that city. This involves a large social program, but the fundamental purpose is, of course, to provide an adequate evangelistic impact upon the nation's capital.

The Centenary has made possible an increase in the posts on the Novi Sad district from twenty to forty-one, so that the main drive now in this region must be toward the energizing of these new centers. There will be expansion, however, much of which will be made possible by the release of funds through the attainment of self-support by churches now established.

There is much greater advance necessary in the work in Macedonia. Here the occupation has not more than begun. The field will be hard to work, but there is a welcome assured wherever the church goes. And as soon as the occupation of territory is complete, the effort to reach the large Mohammedan population must begin in earnest.

Schools and homes.—The scope of the training school for girls at Novi Sad must be broadened. Present standards are high, but there are many types of service that Yugo-Slavia needs that have not yet been undertaken. More room must be provided for students. Ultimately, a similar school for boys should be opened, probably in connection with the central headquarters in Belgrade. The Girls' School at Monastir has made such progress in the two years past that a broadening of its field must be made possible.

Serbia is full of young people whom the war has left parentless and homeless, who must be prepared to make their own way in life. The necessity for this type of education is apparent.

In addition to these schools, the program in Yugo-Slavia calls for the development of such institutions as the Children's Medical Home and Sanitarium in connection with the school at Novi Sad, the Children's and Mothers' Home at Sarajevo, and a training school for Christian workers in Belgrade.

The necessity of providing adequate training for Christian workers needs no argument. A few may go as far as Frankfurt, but the majority, if they are to be trained at all, must be trained at home.

Christianity in action.—The note of community service is struck loud and often in the program of Yugo-Slavia. In addition to the institutions already mentioned, there are already social clubs at Novi Sad, Stari Becej, and Veliki Bechkerek, where are provided:

1. Clubs for boys;
2. Clubs for girls;
3. Bible classes for women;
4. Reading hours for boys and men;
5. Stereopticon and moving pictures;
6. Language classes in Serbian and English;

Sunning at the sanatorium, Ragusa, Belgrade

7. Musical instruction;
8. Distribution of literature;
9. Medical care for the poor.

Plans call for the establishment of a press and a widespread distribution of literature, and a medical work at Strumitza that will be felt throughout Macedonia. Social work is to be stressed in many forms at the Belgrade headquarters. It is suggested that, eventually, there may come agricultural and industrial training schools and perhaps even a farm colony for the demonstration of Christian standards.

BULGARIA

A LABORATORY OF HISTORY

Where trouble is brewed.—Diplomats talk in terms of "danger spots." Of all such, none has played a more sinister role than have the Balkans. Professor Sloane has well written of them as "A Laboratory of History." Great has been the trouble brewed in these national retorts. Of these Balkans, the heart is Bulgaria.

Among all war-weary countries, Bulgaria has a right to be almost the weariest. Since she sent her troops to break the Turkish lines around Adrianople in 1912, Bulgaria has been continually under arms. In her last two wars she has fought on the losing side. She has been stripped of her territory, and saddled with heavy indemnities and a war debt. Thousands of her sons have been slaughtered.

Bulgaria since the war.—"Today," says an observer, "the Bulgarian is war-tired. He is depressed and discouraged. He feels that he has been a victim of misplaced confidence." The promises of the Central Powers for a greater Bulgaria were soon shown to be empty. The king who maneuvered the country into war on the side of those powers has been exiled. But the ideas outlined in the American fourteen points, which did much to end Bulgar resistance and to open the Balkans to the Allies, were also repudiated when peace-making time came.

As elsewhere in Europe, Bulgaria's reaction since the war has been two-sided. There have been those, who because their political hopes have been blighted, have been driven to their knees. Evangelical workers report such a response as they have never before known. But there are also those who are swinging into avowed irreligion. In the face of this movement, with its accompanying social excesses, the state church has shown little power.

Within recent months Bulgaria has faced another post-war condition. Hordes of refugees from Russia and the Near East, refused a shelter in other countries, have been permitted to enter Bulgaria. The Armenian communities already in Bulgaria have labored heroically to care for these refugees, but they have been unable to provide for more than a small part. By further demands upon their own already drained resources the Bulgars, with foreign aid, have proved themselves friends in time of need for thousands.

The future in Bulgaria.—It is hard to prophesy about Bulgaria's political future. At the present time a peasant party is in control, and the major interest of the state is the rehabilitation of agriculture. This is as it should be. Currency is, naturally, depreciated, and the cost of living has mounted as in other war-wrecked countries.

The Bulgar, however, inspires confidence. He is industrious, sober, better educated than other inhabitants of the Balkans, and has proven his ability to take care of himself and build a strong nation, provided he receives an adequate chance.

The location of the country on the Danube is in its favor. Despite present political hindrances, the day is bound to come when the economic needs of Europe will construct that Vienna-to-Bagdad trade route that had so much to do with causing the World War. When that happens, Bulgaria's economic future will be assured.

Because of this economic promise, Bulgaria offers an attractive prospect for many kinds of investment just now. Not the least of these should be the investment of those who work for the establishment of the kingdom of God.

THE EVANGELICAL CONTRIBUTION

A mission well established.—The outbreak of the World War found the Methodist Episcopal Church well established in Bulgaria. Founded in 1857, the mission survived years of discouragement and opposition. By 1914 it had come to a point where it was nearly self-supporting and, with the exception of its superintendent, entirely Bulgarian in personnel.

By agreement with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (the Congregationalists), Methodist work had been confined to the northern half of the kingdom; and there, in Sofia, the capital, in Varna, the chief seaport, in Plevna, and in twenty-one other centers, the church had been planted.

During the World War.—With the coming of the war, and especially when the United States entered on the side of the Allies, the work was terribly embarrassed. The United States never declared war against Bulgaria, but the Methodists of that country were, nevertheless, in a dangerous position. In some way, however, the work went on. When peace came, the property was found to be little damaged, and the devotion of the church membership stood proved.

War reconstruction.—In the interest of Bulgaria, as one of the war-swept nations, it was possible for the Methodist Episcopal Church immediately to undertake reconstruction measures. This aid, coupled with the popular enthusiasm for the aims with which America entered the peace conference, soon gave the church such an opening as it has never had before. Because this opportunity has been in a slight measure grasped, Methodism is now forced to determine whether the resulting strategic situation shall be adequately met.

Macedonian peasant,
Bulgaria

In the Bulgar capital.—The most important step made possible by the Centenary has been the securing of land in Sofia upon which will rise the Methodist headquarters for the entire country. In fact, so valuable was the property at first purchased that the government has taken it over as the site for a public building, and is now offering in exchange a larger plot, even more centrally and advantageously located for the work which is contemplated.

In this new plant there will be conducted an institutional church of the most modern type, as well as a center for the distribution of literature. When the plans are carried out, Methodism will at least be able to deal with the problems of "the most strategic city in the most strategic country in the most strategic peninsula in the world."

The opportunity.—In many other cities, notably Tirnovo, Sevlieve, and Gorna Metropolia, new or enlarged properties testify to the increasing vigor of Bulgarian Methodism. Not all of these are as a result of Centenary gifts. In fact, it is claimed that for twenty-five years before the Centenary the church in America did not provide a cent for additions to the property holdings in Bulgaria. The home missionary society of the Bulgarians has been responsible for the building of most of the present Methodist churches in that country.

This self-reliance on the part of the Bulgarian church is one guarantee for the future. Without it, the work could never have survived the crisis brought by the World War. With it, even the upset state of an impoverished land will not prevent the building of a strong indigenous church.

During the last year the church in Bulgaria has reported a growth in membership of seventy per cent. The American School for Girls, conducted at Lovetch by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, has far surpassed its proper capacity. Everywhere there are evidences of welcome on the part of the plain people, so much so that all sorts of peculiar bodies—the Spiritualists, the Russellites, the Holy Rollers and others—are pressing in. The Methodist Episcopal Church thus finds itself confronting the immediate and pressing necessity of representing a sane form of Protestantism in this nation of many religions.

The program presented to the church in America is not large. The Bulgarian Methodists are themselves ready to bear a great part of the necessary program. Help from America is, however, essential.

If Methodism has any real desire to put its mark on the Balkans, here is the place, and this is the time, for it to move forward.

ALBANIA

A call unanswered.—One of the tragedies of recent years has been the failure of the Methodist Episcopal Church to answer the appeal from Albania. Missionary history presents no parallel to the action taken by the Regency and Government of Albania, when, on October 15, 1920, they united in a formal, official appeal to the Methodists to enter that Mohammedan country, begin a full program, and particularly take charge of a modern system of public education. The government proposed to grant all needed equipment for this undertaking, with the church supplying the educators. "In the providing of sites, of farm lands, of buildings—such as we have, they are yours, and we are your servants," declared the official Albanian appeal.

Careful investigation by the bishop of the Paris area, by representatives of the Board of Foreign Missions, and by American educational experts, brought a unanimous verdict in favor of entering Albania. The country was found to be wide open, conditions more than favorable, and Prof.

Elmer E. Jones, of Northwestern University, concluded a dispassionate, scientific study of the situation with these words: "I cannot make too strong a plea for an immediate occupation of this field. The harvest is ripe. It seems to me that the call is so urgent and so great that we cannot decline."

Despite this wide open door, this unparalleled spectacle of Moslems and Greek Catholics appealing to a Protestant church to occupy their land, the call remains unanswered. The reduction in foreign missionary funds has made it impossible for the church, in view of its previous obligations, to embrace this opportunity.

Will the church, in the face of such a challenge, turn definitely away?

Come and plan a school system for us!

NORWAY

METHODISM'S FARTHEST NORTH

A mission that founded itself.—At Hammerfest, the most northern city in the world, there is a congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Throughout Norway, other Methodist congregations are scattered. Superficial observers, finding them in this Protestant country, have sometimes spoken of them as "interlopers." How came they there?

The Methodist Episcopal Church was established in Norway in the same way that it was established in the other countries of Scandinavia. No American body planned it. A Norse sailor came to New York, found a living Christ in a Methodist service, returned to his native land to testify. Hearts were so stirred by this testimony that they would not permit the sailor permanently to return to the United States but insisted that he give his life to taking his message to his fellow countrymen.

Out of this evangelistic crusade there came societies of those who were unsatisfied by the formal worship of the state church. And from those societies came the Methodist Episcopal Church in Norway.

Present conditions in Norway.—Modern Norway stands at the forefront of the democracies of Europe. Politically, there is equal suffrage for both sexes, with all offices, save in the church, open to women on the same terms as to men. Socially, the condition of the laborer is protected by the most modern industrial laws, surpassing those of the United States, and old distinctions of rank are rapidly being wiped out. In education, Norway claims one of the finest systems of public schools, with one of the lowest rates of illiteracy, in the world.

The stress of post-war days has made itself felt in Norway, even though that country was one of the few in Europe to keep out of the fighting. The cost of living has risen to staggering heights, while business depression has thrown thousands out of work and reduced wages in almost every industry. The government has been forced to exercise its powers of compulsory arbitration to keep the industrial life of Norway going during recent years.

Political control now lies in the hands of the liberals, with conservatives on the one hand, and the socialists and communists on the other, struggling for power. The communists show great strength, and are determinedly anti-religious.

Among the reforms of the last few years, none has been of greater significance than the adoption of a partial form of prohibition. The day is not far distant when Scandinavia will be dry.

The place of Methodism.—What part is the Methodist Episcopal Church playing in this land? Norway has the system of state-supported Lutheran Church to be found elsewhere in Scandinavia. Despite the glory of its past and the regularity of its political connections there is often a lack of present spiritual power.

Because of this, movements have sprung up within the state church, such as the Inner Mission and the China Mission, which gave their followers a chance to express their interest in a more searching type of religious experience or in foreign missions. When the inevitable separation of church and state comes, these movements may be relied on to supply a spiritual vigor sufficient to save what is now a tax-supported institution.

In addition, there have been movements outside of the church resulting in the formation of such bodies as the Free Lutherans, the Baptists, the Salvation Army, the Roman Catholics, and some smaller groups. Of all these "dissenters," however, the Methodist Episcopal Church is by far the strongest.

In a word, the work of Methodism has been to set up an example of fervent piety that is now acknowledged to be a main cause for the stirrings of new religious life both within and without the state church.

THE CHURCH IN NORWAY

Evangelistic centers.—There are seven districts in the Norway Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a study of their location will show that the church is established in all the principal centers of the country.

The most recent statistics available (those for 1920) show a total of forty-seven ordained and eighty-four unordained preachers in this territory, with a membership of practically 8,000. In fifty-six Sunday schools, 12,351 scholars are enrolled, and in eighty-three Epworth Leagues, both senior and junior, there are about 3,500 members.

An unceasing evangelistic program is kept going, with itinerating evangelists, much after the pattern of early Methodism. The church in Norway feels that its peculiar responsibility is to testify to this type of positive evangelicalism.

Woman's socializing touch.—The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Norway is definitely social as well as evangelistic in program. In large measure this is due to the Methodist deaconess, who has made a deep impression upon the entire country.

In all the Methodist work in Protestant Europe the work of the deaconess will be found to be of great importance. These women, who generally live in special homes, sacrifice to an unbelievable extent in their service for the poor. Consequently, their public repute is high.

There are two deaconess homes, one in Christiania and one in Bergen, from which more than a hundred deaconesses have been commissioned. In the deaconess hospital at Bergen, and in many other hospitals and homes for children, these consecrated women carry on their work.

The Epworth League is also helping in conducting summer outings for children. Throughout Norway, Methodism is coming to be known for its works of mercy.

Present lines of advance.—The Centenary period in Norway has been marked by the purchase of the Central Church in Christiania, and by the growth in self-support on the part of the Norse church.

In the new church in the national capital there is, in addition to the regular equipment for a large city congregation, room for the theological seminary and a bookstore; and, as soon as certain temporary restrictions because of post-war housing conditions are removed, there will be dormitory space for many students.

With the falling off in business affecting most adversely the classes that make up the Methodist constituency, there is cause for rejoicing in the advance of the church from a contribution in 1916 of $45,053 to $139,508 in 1920. The day of complete self-support will come quickly as soon as Europe returns to stability.

At present there is likewise a significant development in the work with the children and young people. The Sunday schools, which have been too largely neglected, are being carefully graded and brought, under close supervision, to the place where they can do work of the most approved type. Expressional activities for young people are being developed by the Epworth League.

The immediate need.—To carry on the work in Norway during 1925 on the needed basis the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved this program:

SWEDEN

HOW METHODISM REACHED SWEDEN

The good ship "John Wesley."—Eighty years ago there rode the waters of New York harbor a ship that has had a far-reaching influence in Scandinavia. This was the "John Wesley," a "Bethel" ship, fitted up by Methodists in New York to carry on evangelistic services among sailors in port. Olaf Hedstrom was the skipper-evangelist.

Men were converted who sailed to all parts of the world. Among these converts a young Swede, John P. Larsson, under the impulse that came from his conversion, returned to his home land. There he was joined by a fellow countryman, also converted in America. As laymen the two gave their testimony and great crowds listened.

The Lutheran State Church of Scandinavia was at that time in a period of stagnation such as seems easily to befall state churches. In the simple testimony of these Methodist sailors there was a warmth and note of experience for which thousands of Swedes had been waiting. It needed but the coming of an ordained Methodist preacher from Norway to bring into existence Methodist societies, with subsequent formation into regular churches out of which the Sweden Annual Conference has grown.

English forerunners.—It was, perhaps, prophetic that the founder of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Sweden should have been converted aboard a ship named the "John Wesley." Wesley's influence was felt in Sweden years before the Methodist movement came into existence.

A Swedish ambassador to England, a Count Wrangle, was an intimate friend of the great preacher and was moved by him to take a large part in the formation of a society in Sweden that was designed to awaken a fervent piety within the state church. This Swedish diplomat had greater success in remaining within the established church than had Wesley.

Institution for feeble-minded

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, another wave of Methodist influence came to Sweden. An English manufacturer, an ardent Methodist named Owen, who set up a factory in the country, soon sent for Methodist preachers from England to carry on evangelistic work. Of these, George Scott preached in Sweden for more than ten years, until finally he was driven out at the instigation of the established church.

The work of these English pioneers was not entirely lost, however. It introduced many liberal elements into the state church and did much to prepare the ground for the success that attended later Methodist efforts.

The church founded.—Sixty years ago the first ordained Methodist preacher entered Sweden from Norway. A year later a companion reached the field, having been transferred from a conference in the United States.

In the years following, the interest aroused by the Methodist preachers penetrated almost all circles of Swedish life. One of them was even invited to preach in the royal palace.

Reaction followed, during which some of the preachers were fined and others imprisoned. The permanent establishment, however, went on without interruption. A theological school was planted at Upsala and various other institutions came into being.

After religious liberty had been granted in Sweden, other denominations outside the state church were formed. There are today approximately 600,000 Protestants in the country who are legally known as dissenters. Among them all the Methodist Episcopal Church occupies an outstanding position. Its work has been conducted by Scandinavians. In this sense, therefore, it can hardly be spoken of as a foreign missionary enterprise.

THE WORK IN SWEDEN

The present state of the church.—At the last session of the Swedish Annual Conference reports from 140 churches indicated a total membership of 19,015. In the more than 200 Sunday schools, more than 21,000 children are under instruction. The church in Sweden is raising more than $350,000 a year for the support of the work. All these figures are encouraging but they do not begin to give a picture of the strong life currents that are flowing through Swedish Methodism.

Preachers for Scandinavia.—One of the outstanding results of the Centenary has been the establishment of a Theological Seminary at Goteborg (Gothenburg) in which a high type of preparation can be given. By closing the schools that have been doing effective, but limited, work in Finland, Norway, Denmark and Sweden, and concentrating in this easily accessible center, a need that has been felt with increasing force will be met. Moreover, such a school will make Methodist work throughout Scandinavia more unified than ever.

The Stockholm center.—None of the Centenary advance in Sweden has attracted more attention than the securing of a headquarters building in Stockholm. Here, in the national capital, the varied work of the Central Church is carried on along the most approved institutional lines. Offices are also provided for the leaders of Methodism throughout Sweden, and a bookstore for the Methodist Book Concern.

Practical Christianity.—Of particular importance is the large amount of community service being rendered. When one picks up reports from the Swedish Annual Conference and runs through the lists of churches, one finds items like this:

"An extensive work is carried on among children throughout the country under the direction of the Foreningen For Varnlosa Barn Suppofstran (Society for the Bringing Up and Training of Homeless Children.)

"The Social Mission of the Methodist Church in Stockholm serves many free meals, gives away in the course of a year clothing valued at 1,000 crowns, shelters 560 people, provides work for eighty-seven and gives summer vacations to many children.

"The Goteborg Central Mission gave one meal a day to 150 children throughout the winter, 100 children were clothed and 150 children were given summer outings. A summer home for children has been opened up, two winter colonies have been conducted. Forty old people, unable to work, were fed and forty families received food, fuel, and other necessities.

"Orgryte Mission fed 150 children with one meal a day, sent 110 to summer homes, clothed 100, and helped 150 poor families.

"The Malmo Central Mission sheltered 420 different persons over night, conducted a home for school children whose parents are forced to work, caring for them in the interval between the close of school and the return of their parents to the home, and carried on many other forms of social service.

"The two Methodist Episcopal Churches at Gefle cared for sixty-five families and clothed twenty-five children.

"At Falun a home for poor children is conducted.

"At Kiruna a day nursery is carried on for babies.

"At Ostersund there is also a day nursery.

"About 15,000 meals were given to the poor children in Norkoping."

And so the list might be extended.

Much of this work is under the active direction of the consecrated deaconesses who are trained in the centers at Stockholm and Goteborg. The deaconess hospital at the latter city is one of the outstanding institutions of Swedish Methodism.

Methodism's great contribution.—As in so many other places, the great thing that Methodism has accomplished in Sweden has been the revival of other churches. The evangelistic movement within the state church, with a large interest in foreign missions, is in no small degree due to the influence of forces set in motion by the Methodists. It cannot, however, be said that the need for an evangelistic emphasis in Swedish Protestantism outside the state church is at an end.

While Sweden is one of the progressive countries of Europe, with forward-looking educational, industrial and other social legislation, there are still many conditions that need improvement.

Too frequently the state church seems bound up with conservative interests. During the recent campaign for nation prohibition, for example, when the plebiscite was lost by only 35,000 votes in a total of 1,800,000, the influence of the established church was not felt strongly on the side of prohibition. As one Swedish magazine writer at the time stated, "The history of the state church testifies to the sad fact that it has usually been on the wrong side when great social, religious or moral questions have had to be decided. It has once more missed its opportunity to become a leader of the ethical and religious movements of Sweden."

In conducting a vigorous evangelistic program, with emphasis as suggested upon many forms of social betterment, the Methodist Episcopal Church shows itself in possession of a type of piety that Sweden today greatly needs. In Sweden the recognition of this need is growing.

The immediate need.—In order to carry on the work in Sweden during 1925, the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved the following program:

DENMARK

A MISSION THAT FOUNDED ITSELF

"Go to thy friends."—Wholly without its own design, the Methodist Episcopal Church awoke one day in 1857 to find a flourishing work in Denmark. Danes had been converted in Methodist churches in the United States; some of them had returned to their native land; there they had not found spiritual satisfaction in the state church; the preaching of a Danish minister and the formation of Danish Methodist congregations was the inevitable result. The work in Denmark founded itself.

A land of new ideas.—The influence of Methodism has been felt in many portions of the life of Denmark. Here is a compact little country (about half the size of Indiana) with a population half urban and half agricultural.

Much of the progressiveness of Northern Europe is to be found in the laws providing universal education, abolishing child labor; prohibiting prostitution; placing the liquor traffic under severe restrictions; opening all offices to women (save the ministry, army and navy); securing, through organization of labor and capital, an effective method of dealing with industrial disputes.

For the past half century Denmark has probably contained as enlightened a citizenship, taken as a whole, as has been found in Europe. For this reason, the recent extreme revolutionary movements have made little impression.

Results direct and indirect.—On the other hand, the state church has frequently fallen prey to the formalism that besets such institutions. The theory has been that every Dane belonged to this communion unless a definite act of separation had occurred. In 1922 the daily published by one branch of the state church at Copenhagen declared that "A man or woman is a member of the People's (state) Church even if he or she has committed incest, stolen, or killed, and his right to be a member is not lost even if the member declare Christianity to be falsehood and deceit." Together with this conception of the nature of the church has gone a lack of sympathy with the emerging groups of labor, and a general tendency to hold back the forces of social reform.

Keep in mind these elements and it is easy to understand why the Methodism of Denmark has developed as it has. The national interest in social reform has opened the way for a large institutional development. The conservatism of the state church has left the laboring group by the thousands out of touch with religion. The spiritual longings of many have found their supply in the warm evangelism of Methodism, leading to a revival movement within the state church that has raised up a distinctly Methodist type of Lutheranism.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN DENMARK

An indigenous church.—"Indigenous" is a word that is bound to crop out in any discussion of mission policies in any part of the world in these days. To plant a work, to see the roots go down deep, to guard the growth, until at last there emerges a church that is a part of the soil in which it has been planted—this is the modern missionary ideal.

The Methodist Episcopal Church in Denmark comes as near to being an indigenous church as is to be found on any of our mission fields. Its churches all have Danish pastors, who are supervised by Danish district superintendents, who report to a Danish bishop. The place of the church has become so well-recognized in Danish life that the authorities of the capital make possible an annual "flower day" by which funds are raised for its support. In 1921 the Methodists of Denmark contributed $1,546,769 for the support of the Church, thirty-two times as much as they received from missionary funds. Within a few years this branch of the church should be self-supporting.

Evangelism and education.—The first representative of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Denmark gave his life to an evangelistic ministry. Naturally, for this seemed the form of work most needed in a country where spiritual power was being endangered by formalism. "Most of the people of Denmark are indifferent to religion," says a Danish observer. "They have their children baptized and confirmed in a church, and the church is generally used for weddings and funerals. But that, for the largest part of the Danish people, is all the church is good for."

The response to the evangelistic message of Methodism brought about the planting of churches in the five districts that compose the present Denmark Conference. It helped to lead to the rebirth of zeal within the state church that has given birth to the so-called Inner Mission within this body. Many other denominations have followed the same trail in beginning work in Denmark, among them several forms of Adventists, Pentecostals, and Mormons.

It was not necessary to undergird the work in Denmark with schools. The system of public schools is the pride of the country, and all the children are assured the foundations of an education. In recent years, however, the need for a school wherein Christian workers could be trained has been felt, and a Bible and normal school has been opened. (This is officially known as the Danish Methodist High School, but the title does not accurately suggest its services.) The Lutheran church has many such schools in Denmark, the Baptists one, and the Roman Catholics one.

In this school it is now possible, by short courses as well as by regular courses, to train the young Methodists of Denmark for life service, as well as for the living of a Christian life and the erection of Christian homes. There is great eagerness to obtain a place in the limited student body.

A great institutional center.—A visitor who returned from Europe not long ago said, "I believe the Jerusalem Church in Copenhagen, with its Central Mission, to be the finest piece of institutional work now conducted by the Methodist Episcopal Church in any part of the world."

It is thirteen years since this Central Mission was launched by Pastor (now Bishop) Anton Bast. There is no space to tell the full story of its development, and statistics are too often mere masses of figures. But some will have imagination to see what lies behind the statement that more than 12,000 meetings have been held here; that free lodgings have been given to 125,466; that free meals have been given to 394,171 adults and 907,289 children; that 6,126 have received work within the Mission, and employment has been found for 5,722 more outside; that a home has been provided as a refuge for old people, two more for children, and another for infants; that an income of a million dollars has been raised, from which there remains property worth more than $200,000 in which to carry on the work.

Central Mission, Copenhagen, is Methodism's outstanding example of Christian social service to the needy of Northern Europe. It must be supported, not only because its service merits support, but that it may inspire similar enterprises elsewhere.

FACING THE FUTURE

Moving toward self-support.—Had it not been for the World War, the church in Denmark would have been completely self-supporting before this. As it is, despite the poverty that has come, great advances have been registered. Between 1916 and 1922 the contributions to evangelistic work increased by 333%; to the support of preachers by 300%; to the disciplinary benevolences by 281%; the value of church buildings by 100% and the value of parsonages by 369%. During the same period, gifts to foreign missions increased by more than 300%, reaching $4,000 in 1922.

With this sort of support it can be seen that the day is not far off when the Methodist Episcopal Church in Denmark will not require help from any other land. The policy of the Danish Methodists calls for the rapid bringing to pass of this ideal.

Why aid and what aid? Some may ask, in the presence of such strength as this, why any further aid should be given the work in Denmark. This is a legitimate question. Its answer lies in other conditions in this country.

In the first place, the membership of the church is not large, with not more than 6,000 in the total constituency. These are not rich people. They are poor. The Methodist Episcopal Church is not proselyting among other bodies. It confines its attention to the neglected classes, and rejoices in the response it wins from them. But these are not people with the ability to carry heavy financial burdens. It is remarkable that they do as much as they do.

Again, such institutions as the Bible School and the Theological Seminary, which have in their keeping the whole future success or non-success of this enterprise, are still too undeveloped to be left to their own resources. A bit more support, until they are in a position to do their full work, will increase their future service many times.

Finally, the devotion of these Methodists in Denmark merits support. They are not asking great sums. The plans they have made call for such advance as can be made without too much strain on the present work. Admiration for the achievements of the past, with recognition of the opportunity of the present, should insure such aid in the building of churches, the extension of city missions and the strengthening of schools as is asked.

OUT OF THE WAR

A new Protestant nation.—The religious traditions of most of the European nations established by the Treaty of Versailles are Catholic, either Roman or Greek. Finland is Protestant. Her 3,335,237 people are, by law, members of the State Church (Lutheran) and could not, until recently, belong to any other without vast difficulty. There are, to be sure, some Greek Catholics, for there are about 50,000 Russians in this republic that was once a province of the Tsar. Methodists, Baptists, Jews, and Mohammedans also find place in the religious census. But the overwhelming majority of the people belong to the State Church.

Through the fire.—Although the World War did not, according to the communiques, include Finland in its theatre, this land beside the Baltic suffered as severely as any part of Europe. Beginning as a duchy of the Russian Empire, but a duchy where disaffection was known to be rife, Finland had to make her contribution to the Russian war strength, and to support 700,000 Russian soldiers.

When the Russian revolution overthrew the Tsar in 1917, Finland asserted her independence. An internal struggle for control between the conservative and socialistic forces followed, out of which came the bloody civil war of 1918. The outside world hardly knows yet that this struggle between the "Reds" and "Whites" was so bitter that when, after a year of fighting, the conservatives won, the little republic found herself with 40,000 orphans on her hands!

Finland's problems.—Apparently the control of the Whites over Finland is complete. But, beneath the surface, there is immense dissatisfaction among the laboring classes. If support should be offered from Russia it is likely that the Reds would think themselves strong enough to renew the civil war tomorrow.

Now that the period of reprisals following the war of 1918 has passed, Finland is being given a fairly good government. The school system is functioning well; national prohibition has come to stay; women have won a place of equality, legally, politically, and socially, with men. Many experiments for improving conditions of industry are being carried on. The national finances are in better shape than in most European states. It is necessary, however, to win the allegiance of thousands of working people to this regime in order to insure its stability. It cannot be said that this has yet been accomplished.

As in so many other states, the political problem roots back in economic conditions. Wages have risen sharply in Finland, a common laborer now receiving from eighty cents to a dollar a day. A few years ago this would have been a princely wage. But the cost of living has also risen. Most of the food staples of Finland are imported, many of them from America. Clothing has reached the point where a suit will absorb a year's savings. Rents are so high that few workers can afford more than a single room, no matter how large the family.

Emanuel Methodist Episcopal Church,

Coupled with these economic and political problems, the religious situation demands attention. Most of the privileges of the State Church have been abolished, and freedom of worship established. Complete separation of church and state is coming soon. Yet the State Church is as supine as in many other countries of northern Europe. The grant of religious freedom may only show openly the drift toward indifference and atheism that has been going on within the church for years. Some power that will wake to life warm spiritual forces within the Protestantism of Finland is needed if that land is to be saved from the same religious breakdown that threatens Russia.

METHODISM IN FINLAND

How the work was planted.—The Methodist Episcopal Church is at work throughout Finland. How did it come there? As in the other European states, the founding of this work was not planned by the church.

The year after the American Civil War closed, two young Finnish sailors were converted in a Methodist service in New York City. Under the inspiration of their new spiritual experience they returned to Finland, preaching the gospel. Later, local preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church came from Sweden to assist them.

By 1891 there were enough members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Finland to secure legal recognition. Since that time the work has grown steadily, although there has never been a foreign missionary within the bounds of the Finland Conference.

Present occupation.—The work in Finland is divided between two districts, one, concerned wholly with the Finns, and one confining its attention to Swedes, of whom there are 350,000 in Finland. There are churches for Finns in fourteen of the thirty-eight cities and in a majority of

From the Emanuel Methodist Episcopal Sunday school, Helsingfors

Swedish centers. In addition, there are two orphanages for Finnish children, three for Swedish, a Swedish nursery and old folks' home and a theological seminary for Finns—the only Methodist school for Finns in the world.

A growing church.—Although Finland has been passing through the depression of the world war and the terrors of its own civil war, church growth has been steady. There were, for example, 679 Finnish members in 1916, when the Centenary was launched; today, there are 1,604. There are likewise, 1,078 Swedish members. In fifty-three Sunday schools, there are 4,352 students, and there are Epworth Leagues in practically all the churches with a total membership of 2,633 in the Junior and Senior branches.

At the same time contributions from the membership have greatly increased. In 1916 Finnish Methodists gave 8,072 Finnish marks* for the support of the pastor-

*It is impossible to report these justly in terms of American money because of the fluctuation in value of the Finnish mark. Normally, this is worth about nineteen cents in American money. On January 1, 1923, it was worth approximately two and one half cents.

ate; in 1922, 93,965 Finnish marks. At the same time the support of the pastors on the Swedish district increased from Fmk. 20,445 to Fmk. 155,750. For missions and benevolences, contributions of Finnish Methodists rose from Fmk. 5,792 in 1916 to Fmk. 126,720 in 1922. The Swedish district increased its offering for foreign missions during the same period from Fmk. 4,840 to Fmk. 28,425 and other benevolences grew proportionately. In 1916 church properties on the Finnish district were valued at Fmk. 337,300, upon which there was a debt of Fmk. 207,118. At present the value of properties has increased to Fmk. 1,281,408 while the debt has been reduced to Fmk. 69,854. The value of the churches and parsonages on the Swedish district has risen from Fmk. 685,583 to Fmk. 4,162,870.

While the loss in exchange value must be considered, this amazing growth represents a real advance on the part of the church, both Finnish and Swedish, in Finland. The income of the Methodists in that country has not kept pace with the change in the value of the Finnish mark.

So that while the increase in pastoral support, for example, is about 800 per cent in terms of Finnish marks, it likewise represents at least 200 per cent, probably more, in terms of increased proportion of income contributed.

What is the future to be?—The line of advance in Finland is very plain. For most of this the Methodist Episcopal Church in that country will provide. Help is asked from America for the provision of a headquarters building in the capital, Helsingfors; a deaconess hospital in the same city; and churches and chapels in five other cities and several smaller towns.

The building in Helsingfors is especially important. In it there will be not only a varied institutional church work, but the Theological Seminary and a center for the distribution of evangelical literature.

The Methodist Episcopal Church is in a position promising unusual success for an institutional program. In the internal struggle, it has been able to win the confidence of both Reds and Whites. No matter which party finally controls Finland, Methodist work will be free from interference and will have the sympathy of the authorities.

The opening of churches and chapels is always in response to invitations, which are coming in increasing numbers now that Finland has religious freedom. There is every indication that Methodism can expand its work in Finland many times during the next few years.

The immediate need.—By far the larger part of the advance program in war-stricken Finland will be borne by the Finnish Methodists but they, in their poverty, call upon their American brethren for support in 1925 to the following extent:

GERMANY

AFTER THE WAR

An agent of international good will.—When Richard Wobith, superintendent of the Southern District of the South Germany Conference came to answer the question in the Post-Centenary Survey asking for “the urgent, significant movements creating a special opportunity for Christianity,” he wrote: “The greatest challenge in these days is that the Methodist Episcopal Church is the only one of all the Protestant churches of the world which is international and is able with the help of God, to give her interests to the reconciliation of the nations. For there is no peace now; only war. Many of the best men in our nation hope that the Methodist Episcopal Church will do this work.”

Of course, the Methodist Episcopal Church can not alone assuage the wounds of the war. It is true, however, that the peculiar position of the church, with its international organization, gives it a unique opportunity as well as an inescapable responsibility.

Throughout the war the Methodist Episcopal Church continued its work in Germany, as well as on the other side of the fighting lines. Under the leadership of Bishop Nuelsen, it was the first body to bring relief to many parts of the country after the signing of the armistice. Today, its membership in Germany is in the midst of a great spiritual advance. If the opportunity can be grasped, the Methodist Episcopal Church may become an instrument to show the new Germany the good will of the Christians of other nations, as well as to furnish a rallying point for a rekindled Protestantism in that land.

Cross-currents.—It is impossible in the limits of this volume to depict the internal condition of Germany after the war. Moreover, so rapidly are events occurring that any statement is likely to be out of date before this can be published. In the main, however, it may be said that Germany finds herself in the grip of disillusionment because of the failure of the promises made her by her militaristic leaders; of resentment because of what she holds to have been a betrayal of the conditions of the armistice in the Versailles Treaty; of desperation because of the mounting cost of living combined with the falling value of the currency; and of bewilderment because no way of escape is seen from the present chaos.

No one believes that a people with the energy and resources of the Germans can permanently be reduced to a secondary position. Up to the present, however, it has been impossible for the government or any other agency to unite the Germans behind any one program. Those who might be willing, in an effort to recover from the losses of the war, to work long hours for low wages can hardly be expected to give many weeks of hard labor when wages deemed satisfactory at the beginning of a week may not be found, when pay day comes, sufficient to provide food, clothing, and shelter.

This is the condition in Germany and it is producing its inevitable result. Exasperation, cynicism, and irresponsibility mix together in all classes. What their final product may be no man can say. Some declare that it will be revolution. All that can safely be predicted is that Germany for the next few years is likely at almost any time to be a victim of sudden convulsion.

In the Deaconess Home, Nürnberg

Germany's spiritual needs.—In the midst of this confusion, an appalling amount of spiritual need is manifesting itself in Germany. The downfall of the monarchy brought about the separation of church and state. In North Germany the Lutheran State Church has held millions in a nominal membership. Thousands have withdrawn. The agnostic elements so often found in continental socialism have gathered great strength. Some pessimists have seen all Germany drifting into infidelity.

On the other hand, the Roman Catholics of South Germany have experienced a revival, and have on several occasions since the establishment of the republic held the balance of political power.

In addition, there have been strange outcroppings of exotic religious beliefs. Buddhism has been strongly pushed, and various occult bodies have claimed thousands of supporters. Post-war Germany comes near to being a happy hunting ground for the religious faddist and charlatan.

The true spiritual hunger of the nation, however, is evidenced by an outburst of religious passion on the part of the young. Hundreds of students in schools and universities have pledged themselves to simplicity and cleanness of life and are carrying on a passionate propaganda for the salvation of their nation from the social ills that have swept in on her like a flood.

Germany seems to have done with formal religion. Only a vital spiritual awakening can meet her need. If she does not find this, she is likely to give her resources to a stark materialism that spells disaster for the future.

METHODISM IN GERMANY

Where the church is planted.—When the first preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church arrived in Bremen in 1849, having been stirred to effort in the fatherland by his conversion in the United States, he found Germany just entering upon reaction following abortive revolution. It was the failure of the uprisings of '49 that made possible the German empire of the Hohen-zollerns. But even under the restrictions of that empire, Methodism grew.

Today, with all restrictions removed, the Methodist Episcopal Church has two annual conferences in Germany, with congregations in most of the cities. The last available reports show 182 members of conferences, forty-seven local preachers and 589 exhorters and lay preachers. There are more than 25,000 full members, more than 7,000 probationers, more than 8,000 baptized children, more than 500 Sunday schools with 35,000 enrolled pupils. The Epworth League is organized in most of the large centers. Incomplete reports say that it has a membership of about 10,000.

Types of work conducted.—As in other Protestant countries of Europe, the main effort of the Methodist Episcopal Church has been evangelistic. This has led to the formation of a distinct church. To an even larger extent, it has led to the awakening of evangelical zeal in many of the pastors of the state church. In truth, the work of Methodism in Germany has not been unlike that in England, save that in England the disciples of Wesley were forced generally outside the established church, and in Germany a majority of them have remained within the older communion.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has always been distinguished by a vital piety and zeal for good works which have made it, in these post-war days the center of relief activities in many cities.

It is unnecessary in a country such as Germany to conduct educational work, except for specialized theological training. Neither are distinctive medical enterprises needed. The deaconess movement has been unusually powerful and provides the staff whereby several homes for the helpless, as well as other benevolences, are conducted.

The entire work in Germany would be upon a self-supporting basis today if it had not been for the war and for the falling value of German currency. As it is, it will be necessary to provide some help for this work until conditions are more nearly stabilized. German Methodists have increased their contributions by many millions of marks within the last few years. As soon as this currency reaches stabilization, they will make the entire work self-supporting.

Young people to the fore.—In this critical period it is encouraging to see how rapidly the Methodist Episcopal Church in Germany is increasing in its ministry to the young.

Until recently it could hardly be said that there has been Sunday-school work in the sense in which it is known in America. The so-called Sunday schools were largely groups or classes in catechism, to which the pastors also preached. At twelve years of age the children dropped out automatically.

With modern Sunday-school literature, institutes, teacher-training classes and well-trained general leadership all this is changing. The Epworth League, too, is proving an organization by which the awakening youth of the church can give expression to its religious zeal. Epworth

Faculty and some of the students of Martin Mission Institute League conventions are reported as overflowing the largest halls available.

Many of the young people are giving impetus to the temperance propaganda which is carried on by the church, particularly from Augsburg and Mannheim.

The deaconess in action.—Some of the outstanding deaconess institutions of the Methodist world are in Germany. In Hamburg, Stettin, Berlin, Leipzig, Dresden, Nagold, Chemnitz, Frankfort, Plauen, Mannheim, Nuremburg, Heilbronn, Stuttgart, Freudenstadt, and Munich are to be found philanthropic institutions staffed by the distinctively-garbed "sisters" of the church. Indeed, it is the social service conducted by the deaconesses that may be said to have made the Methodist Episcopal Church known to thousands who would have remained indifferent to all other forms of approach. The church is fortunate, in this period of social upheaval, to have such trained and effective agents for carrying its ministries among the needy.

A school that reaches far.—In Frankfort-on-Main one of the most important institutions in all Methodism is located. Here in the Theological Seminary, known locally as Martin's Institute, seventy-eight students are preparing to preach the gospel in Switzerland, Austria, Hungary, the Baltic Republics, Russia, Yugo-Slavia, Bulgaria, as well as in Germany.

When the buildings of this school were completed, in the same month that the World War broke out, it was expected that they would prove ample for the needs of at least a generation. Already they are so overcrowded that students are forced to sleep in classrooms and members of the faculty can not be given accommodations for their families. Because its success is so necessary for the future growth of the church in Europe, the theological seminary in Frankfort demands support.

HELP IN TIME OF NEED

A moment of promise.—It is hard to visualize the situation in German Methodism. On the one hand there is the life of the nation largely in flux, with hundreds of thousands cutting loose from former religious affiliations. On the other hand stands a church with an international outreach, feeling within itself the fires of vigorous revival.

From city after city come reports of congregations that have completely outgrown their available quarters. In many centers, edifices of the old state church, which have not seen more than a handful at their own services, when generously offered to the Methodists have been crowded to the doors.

It seems possible to go ahead to almost any sort of an ingathering in Germany under the present conditions. However, the post-war poverty makes it impossible for the Methodists of Germany to provide the churches with which to take advantage of this opportunity.

With the help of the Centenary, German Methodism has secured a few new churches, notably in Berlin, Stuttgart, Munich, Frankfort, as well as homes in five places for the old and for undernourished children. The devotion of the church can be seen in the contributions for mission work that have piled up when, under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles, Germans are excluded as missionaries from most of the world, and, at the same time, there has been no guarantee but that a further fall in the mark would wipe out the value of the collections thus sacrificially given.

With a people with this sort of practical piety and a situation of this compelling character, surely the Methodist Episcopal Church will not hesitate to move forward to a new position of power.

The immediate need.—The Methodist Episcopal Church is proceeding very carefully in its advance in all the war-torn countries of Europe. But, in view of the remarkable opportunity, it has recognized that during 1925 the program in Germany should include:

SWITZERLAND

A FREE CHURCH IN A FREE LAND

Where Protestantism came to power.—In the city of Geneva stands a great memorial to the Protestant reformers who broke the power of the papacy. It is hard to think of Switzerland without thinking of Calvin, Farel, Zwingli, and the streams of influence that have flowed out of that little mountain-girt home of freedom to make a new Europe.

Today the traveler in Switzerland finds himself in a land where two-thirds of the population is Protestant but, as in so many other European countries, where the establishment of a state church has tended toward a species of formalism in religion. As a result there has been room for the ministry of a foreign Protestant church and the response to the service rendered by Methodism has, in proportion to the population, been larger in Switzerland than in any other European country.

The contribution of Methodism.—The Methodist Episcopal Church entered Switzerland from Germany and its work has been largely confined to the German-speaking portion of the confederacy. It required thirty-two years before the laws of the country and the strength of the church made possible any legal standing. During that period, however, so vital an evangelistic program was conducted that the state church felt its influence and began likewise to establish Sunday schools, conduct revival meetings and employ house-to-house visitation by laymen.

As in other Protestant countries of Europe, this stirring of the established church may be regarded as among the most important contributions made by Methodism.

SWISS METHODISM

The church today.—In the two districts of the Switzerland Annual Conference there are more than 10,000 church members worshipping in 250 congregations.

Methodist Publishing House, Zurich

Great attention is being given to the Christian nurture of youth, with more than 21,000 Sunday-school pupils and more than 100 chapters of the Epworth League.

The latest reports available show that, despite post-war conditions that have greatly reduced the income of most of the members of the church, Swiss Methodists contributed an average of more than $25.00 per member for the support of the church in 1921.

Offerings for foreign missions and other benevolent purposes have been generous. In the days of post-war readjustment, these and American funds, have provided hundreds of children in Germany, Austria, Italy, and Yugo-Slavia with food and vacations in health resorts.

At the central headquarters in Zurich there is not only a flourishing congregation, with many forms of institutional service, but a book concern which is one of the best known evangelical agencies in Europe.

Social Christianity.—As elsewhere in Europe, the Methodist Episcopal Church combines with an evangelistic zeal a persistence in good deeds that is winning the confidence and support of the communities in which it is working. In the present effort to establish temperance in Switzerland, the Temperance Alliance of the Methodist Episcopal Church is doing a real work.

There are 150 deaconesses, stationed in seven centers, conducting a great hospital in Zurich and much other nursing and caring for children, the aged, the sick, the poor in other parts of the country. As already stated, the past two or three years have been marked by much work undertaken in behalf of needy children in other European nations. Swiss Methodism is known for its good works throughout Central Europe.

The immediate need.—During 1925 the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved the following program for Switzerland:

AUSTRIA

THE AFTERMATH OF WAR

Just to be kept alive.—So stern are conditions in Austria that there is little planning for the future. It is enough if food and shelter for the day's needs can be supplied.

Austria-Hungary in 1914 and Austria today

Accordingly, when the Methodist Episcopal Church opens a school, the directors feel that practically the only matter with which they can now deal is the saving of the children's lives. We must wait, they say, until another generation is born before it will be possible to do much educational work. Years of starvation have killed thousands of children who would be in schools today, and left the rest so weakened that they can not maintain the strain of class room work.

In every line the forces that would build the future Austria feel that their present efforts must be centered upon the fundamental service of keeping folks alive. After that is done, it will be time enough to consider other things.

What hope has Austria?—The treaty of St. Germaine reduced Vienna to a position as head of a petty state with only 6,500,000 people. Rich iron deposits were taken away and the major part of the food supply must now be obtained from peoples who, in past years, learned to hate Austria.

The state has printed paper money in such quantities that it now has lost practically all value. Common laborers receive between forty and fifty thousand crowns in a day. By the time this book is printed they may be receiving between eighty and a hundred thousand crowns a day and still not have sufficient to feed their families.

Austria's hope for the future lies in her superb position athwart the trade routes between north and south and east and west Europe. In addition, she still has large forests and with sufficient capital could develop four million horsepower from available water supply.

The League of Nations is interesting itself in Austria. There is some hope that under its lead Austria may be rescued from the awful fate that has befallen it.

Religious freedom newly won.—From the midst of all this misery, Austria can report at least one religious advance as a result of the World War. Ten years ago the most Roman Catholic country in Europe, and still the center of a strong Catholic movement, the new state has proclaimed religious freedom.

This has not come as a result of any liberalizing on the part of the Catholic Church, but rather because of the Social Democrats. Themselves largely anti-religious, and in many cases even atheistic, the Socialists and Communists have been forced to proclaim religious tolerance to break the grip of the old hierarchy.

Under these circumstances the Protestants, of whom the Lutheran, the Reformed, the Baptist, and the Methodist Episcopal Churches are the leaders, can prosecute their work with a success that was totally impossible under the old regime.

THE RELIGIOUS OUTLOOK

How Methodism is advancing.—The Methodist Episcopal Church was established in Austria by workers from Germany. Its work has been largely in and about the city of Vienna. As political conditions now stand this is an advantage, because the Peace Treaty has left Vienna, as a recent magazine article phrases it, "a capital without a nation."

Of the twenty-one districts that comprise the city, seven have some form of Methodist occupation. One well-equipped new church in particular stands as a monument to the Centenary. All the churches

service possible

are crowded and reports come of Sunday schools forced to hold many of their classes in the streets because of the lack of room.

There is no proselyting from other Protestant groups, for practically all converts have been either nominal Catholics or atheists. One of the congregations in Vienna is composed of Czecho-Slovaks, of whom there are at least 400,000 in the capital.

Much of the interest in the Methodist Episcopal Church is a result of relief measures undertaken under Centenary auspices in the days immediately following the war. This relief work has been carried on largely through the Methodists of Scandinavia and Switzerland, with additional supporting funds from America, and has won for the church both popular esteem and government recognition.

Tuernitz—haven of refuge.—The outstanding contribution of Methodism to Austria's most pressing problem is the home for children at Tuernitz. Here in the Tyrolean Alps a small sanitarium has been purchased and in it children between four and fourteen years of age receive an average of four weeks in which to recover from undernourishment and malnutrition. All the children admitted give evidence of rickets, although no hospital or bed-ridden cases are taken. Six hundred and fifty of these children are aided in a year. This does not seem many amid the thousands of needy youngsters in Austria, but it is a form of service that is making a deep impression upon the Austrian people in their time of great need.

There are also in Tuernitz some accommodations for the very old and for young people, of whom, it is reported, at least sixty per cent in Austria today are tubercular. The work of this center is carried on largely by a corps of Methodist deaconesses.

Fighting intemperance.—The church is also emphasizing the promotion of temperance. Following the war there has been in Austria, as in other parts of Europe, a sad let-down in moral habits. Such an outbreak of drunkenness has come as to frighten the authorities. With full government backing, therefore, and with co-operation from several other bodies, including Socialists, Nationalists, and Catholics, the Methodist Episcopal Church has carried its traditional fight against intemperance to Austria.

Observers speak of the Austrian Epworth League as "the fighting troops of the prohibition movement," and the recognition by all bodies of the power of the temperance propaganda conducted by the Methodists is hearty.

Not only in the fight against drink, but also in the general evangelistic work, large use is being made of posters and hand bills, tracts, newspaper advertisements, and Bible distribution.

Waiting for the distribution of Methodist relief supplies in Vienna, in the winter of 1919

What the future holds.—It is impossible under the present circumstances to plan for any very distant future in Austria.

In two or three centers congregations have gathered. Because of the conditions, it is impossible for them to contribute largely. Edifices that can be used as churches for them should be purchased.

As rapidly as possible other sections of Vienna should be entered. Now seems the best of all times because of the high value of American money, to purchase the central headquarters so long needed. Certainly the humanitarian work must not be allowed to decrease.

The immediate need.—In view of all the conditions in Austria the Methodist Episcopal Church has approved this program of work for 1925:

HUNGARY

A NATION IN THE MAKING

The political situation in Hungary.—In the break-up of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, following the World War, Magyar aspirations for independence found their realization. To be sure, heavy penalties were imposed, such as the loss of many coal mines, most of the iron works, and all forests, for participation in the war. But this state was left in a much more advantageous position than was Austria, and the evolution of a lasting nation with present boundaries seems assured.

Since the end of the war Hungary has been the scene of several political overthrows. The decision of the Allies banished the Hapsburgs, rulers in Central Europe for a millennium. But the monarchy made two attempts at a restoration, and the fear of a Hapsburg coup is not yet entirely gone. The first liberal government set up did not prove strong enough to cope with the fierce passions at large, and was followed by a communist regime. Against this all the conservative forces in the country rallied, and it was overthrown with a vast amount of bloodshed.

The "blue Danube" is the key to much of the history of Central Europe

The dictatorship under Admiral Horthy, set up following the communists, still persists. At present, Hungary is fairly tranquil, although it is claimed that this is a tranquillity inspired by fear rather than by complete satisfaction with the government.

Living and labor conditions.—Socially, Hungary is having a hard time recovering from the war as any of her central European neighbors. The salaried classes are in a desperate dilemma, because of the decrease in the value of the paper money of the state, while professional incomes have not increased enough to make up the difference. There are thousands of unemployed among the laboring groups, and many other thousands who are not paid enough to live under present conditions. Relief work, such as has been conducted by the Methodist Episcopal Church, has been the only means of keeping hundreds alive. The Methodists of Scandinavia have had a fine part in this work of relief. The larger share, however, has been provided, rightly, from America.

Social conditions are bound to feel the effect of such a period. The increase in vice, already bad enough, is appalling. The craving for stimulation results in increased drunkenness. Even in the districts outside Budapest, where the farmers have sufficient food, increase in intemperance and lowering of the moral standards are reported.

Religious vigor needed.—Such conditions call for a strong program on the part of the churches. Unfortunately, the Reformed and Lutheran churches, which might have been looked to for Protestant leadership in such a time, seem content with a formal program. Dwindling congregations and a general spiritual stupor characterize many of their parishes.

The Roman Catholic Church has seized upon this as a day of opportunity. Protestantism, with its freedom of thought, is depicted as the soil in which political radicalism can flourish, while Catholicism is urged as the bulwark of the conservative order. As the conservatives now control Hungary, this helps forward the Catholic reaction. State schools are under the domination of Rome. Masonic lodges are forbidden. There is a strong anti-Semitic movement, with Catholic support. Such a reaction, upon such a foundation, cannot last long. It does, however, hinder present advance.

The vigor of Protestantism is represented in Hungary by the Baptists, the Methodists, the Adventists, and a group of pastors within the Reformed and Lutheran Churches who have been touched by evangelical fervor. This whole group is small, however, when compared with the forces against which they must work.

METHODISM IN HUNGARY

Wesley's spirit still at work.—The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Hungary reminds one of the work of Wesley in England. Begun as recently as 1906, by workers sent from Germany, and confining itself until recently to the German-speaking, the best result up to the present is to be seen in the fifty pastors of the Reformed Church (one of the churches recognized by the state) who, although taunted by their colleagues as Methodists, are preaching the necessity for conversion and a new birth.

It cannot be said that relations with other Protestant bodies have been cordial in Hungary. Insistence among other bodies upon certain forms as a necessity for salvation has provoked opposition to the Methodists, with their broad attitude toward these things. But a better spirit of understanding is emerging, as it becomes clear that Methodism, the latest arrival, has no intention of proselyting from other Protestant bodies.

Methodist centers.—Budapest, Baranya and Tolna, Nyiregyhaza, Kegad, and Lapron are centers planned for Methodist work. The last two cities have not yet been occupied.

Budapest must be the center for any work in Hungary. Here are about 3,000,000 people to be reached, of whom fifty per cent are Catholics, forty per cent members of the Lutheran and Reformed churches, and ten per cent Jews. The work until two years ago was largely confined to Germans, but recent advances toward the Hungarians have resulted in the formation of two flourishing congregations. The temperance propaganda of the church in Budapest, made possible by a grant from America, has been particularly effective in winning public attention. The type of ministry in this region has been high, and the church can be said to be well established. The contributions of the churches have been generous, particularly in view of the currency chaos. One congregation in Budapest has achieved self-support.

In the province of Baranya and Tolna, in southern Hungary, the work is among the peasantry. The work is only a year old, but a hundred members and probationers have already been gathered. There are a million people in this region.

In northern Hungary our present center is Nyiregyhaza, from which we hope ultimately to reach two million people. After a year of work the church membership numbers one hundred fifty.

Types of effort.—In Budapest and its environs, the church must conduct a diversified social program, with emphasis upon the teaching of temperance, upon the development of Sunday schools and other work for young people, night classes for laborers, and classes in home economics for women, and upon a widespread distribution of literature. An industrial school for women and girls is planned in one town, and a home for laborers in another. Churches are called for in several places. Equipment for aggressive evangelistic campaigns is required.

On the other districts, much the same line of advance is to be followed. The towns to be entered have been carefully chosen. Everywhere the emphasis is to be upon evangelism, in order to arouse as speedily as possible the forces latent in the Protestant churches, and to give the gospel to the multitudes who have actual contact with no church or are mere formalists in religion.

The immediate need.—The inadequacy of our present program makes advance in Hungary imperative. For 1925 the church has approved the following program:

Work Operations will be conducted on these lines:

RUSSIA

CLOSED OR OPEN

“When Russia opens.”—Since the downfall of the Tsar it has become the habit of forward-looking Protestants to say, “When Russia opens, we must go into that country with one of the strongest advance movements the church has ever launched. Russia is hungry for vital religion. When she opens, then is our chance.”

But is this kind of talk longer permissible? Bishop Nuelsen, on his last trip to America, after spending weeks in Russia, said, “Soviet Russia is open. Soviet Russia is open to the Methodist message. Soviet Russia is open to a large evangelistic and reform movement in the Russian Church and outside the Russian Church. . . . I had all of our pastors in Russia together, and every one of these pastors reported that in the town where he is preaching the gospel our chapels are too small to contain the crowds. I inquired of them whether there was any interference on the part of the government. They said to me, ‘There is not the slightest interference; we are absolutely at liberty to preach the gospel, and we have more calls than we can answer.’”

In the face of such a situation it is hardly possible longer to escape responsibility for the evangelization of Russia by talking about what may be done “when Russia opens.” That hour is here. How will the church meet it?

What is happening in Russia.—At the outbreak of the World War, Russia seemed to pass behind a veil. The veil lifted for a moment when the autocracy was overthrown, but soon descended again. Only fleeting, broken flashes have been given since 1917. Few Americans today believe that they know completely what is happening in Russia.

It is important, however, that, without longer delay, events in Russia be made clear to the rest of the world. For, be the Bolsheviks ever so mistaken, it is none the less true that in Russia, at this moment, there is being carried on the vastest political and economic experiment the world has ever seen. The two are so closely interrelated that they cannot be considered separately.

Future generations will hardly be able to understand how we have been content to live in ignorance in the presence of the phenomenon of Russia. They will hold it a folly past belief that we have allowed our prejudices or our fears or a censorship or any other factor to withhold from us the facts concerning this experiment in a land that sweeps from the Baltic to the Pacific.

Russian confusions.—So contradictory are the reports that come out of Russia that many have almost stopped reading them, thinking frank ignorance safer than hopeless confusion. There is no room here to enumerate all the matters concerning which testimony disagrees.

Some of them are economic. To what extent has the soviet government abandoned its communistic principles? Has it acknowledged that trade is impossible without the motive of private profit? Is Russia sinking deeper into distress, or is it climbing toward economic rehabilitation?

Some of them are humanitarian. Are there starving people left in Russia? Is tuberculosis as common as has been charged among Russian children?

Some of them are religious. Is the soviet government aggressively anti-Christian? Will there be any place for the church in the soviet state when and if that is finally established? Will Protestant churches be allowed to conduct work from bases in capitalistic countries?

Choir at Petrograd

Russian facts.—In contrast to these confusions there are some facts that challenge attention.

There are the enormous resources of Russia, both in people and in other sources of wealth. No country with such potentialities can forever be kept in a secondary position. The centers of world influence are moving north. Once they were on the Euphrates and the Nile; then they were on the Mediterranean; now they are on the Hudson and the Thames, tomorrow—?

There is the stability of the Russian government. Even reactionary newspapers have stopped predicting the fall of Lenin. He has been in power now longer than any other important premier in Europe. Even should he be removed from the stage personally, the theory of government that he represents will continue. "If anybody wants to wait for the overthrow of the present regime in Russia," Bishop Nuelsen has said, "he will have to wait for a long time. I think the present government in Russia is as firmly established as any government in Europe."

There is the spiritual responsiveness of the people. Despite the sterility of the Orthodox Church, a part of the Tsar's bureaucracy since the days of Peter the Great, and despite the persecutions of the soviet period, the masses in Russia remain the most inherently religious people in the West. Badly as they have been deceived by their spiritual shepherds in the past, they still hunger and thirst after righteousness. Is it possible that they are not to be filled?

FACING THE OPPORTUNITY

Where Methodism now stands.—The Methodist Episcopal Church entered Russia in 1907. This was at the time when the empire of the Tsar was showing its first response to popular demand for reform, but restrictions were still severe enough to make rapid expansion impossible. It cost the pioneers years to win the confidence of the authorities. In Petrograd, for example, it took six months of cultivation, after property had been purchased, before it could be used for religious purposes.

When the war broke out in 1914 the strongest Methodist churches were in the Baltic provinces, where they now continue to flourish in independent states. (See Finland and The Baltic Republics.) Much of the Protestant work in Russia was prohibited, but the Methodist Episcopal Church was allowed to carry on.

With the Revolution of 1917 another stage began. The American Superintendent of the Russian mission, with all other Americans, was ordered out of Russia by his own government. But during all the disorders that followed, the church held its ground. In Petrograd the Methodist deaconess, Sister Anna Ecklund, became an angel of mercy to thousands. In churches, in schools, in other government institutions she distributed relief from abroad. By her courage she held the property of the church in Petrograd inviolate when all other wooden buildings in the city were being torn down for firewood.

There are now about ten organized circuits of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Russia, with many other preaching points where permanent occupation will be welcomed. Trained pastors are needed, but as these are provided the church in Russia should go forward with great rapidity.

The strategic hour.—Every indication, however, shows that Methodism is to render its greatest service by helping to revive vital religion within the Russian Church. With the coming to power of the Bolsheviks, the old church placed itself in violent opposition. Most of the communist leaders are agnostics or atheists, with little sympathy for the church under any circumstances. Finding it an agent of reaction, the soviet leaders set about disciplining it.

It has proved impossible to suppress the church. Tales of the saints have been proved myths; miracles proved hoaxes; some priests proved degenerates. But the faith of the masses has lived on. Yet out of the trial to which the church has been subjected has come a new group of church leaders, priests who seek a revitalizing of the whole ecclesiastical structure of Russia.

To this new party has been given the name of "The Living Church." It has found a platform upon which it may work without trouble from the government. In fact, so favorable have been its relations with the government that it has been called, by other elements in the old Russian church, a creature of the soviets.

This progressive group is seeking help in its stupendous task of reforming a church that never felt the stirrings that came to the other churches of Europe through the Renaissance, the Reformation, or the Evangelical Revival. And, wonder of wonders, it passes by advances made from Rome and elsewhere, deliberately to seek aid from the Methodist Episcopal Church! This is a translation of part of the official appeal recently received:

In conformity with ancient ecclesiastical laws, the Orthodox Church of Russia intends to meet for its second territorial council on the tenth of February, 1923, in Moscow.

The group, "Living Church," which is at present engaged in the work of preparing for and convoking the council, invites the friendly American Methodist Episcopal Church to send at that time delegated brethren who through their experience in the organization of a free church under a republican form of state government could render aid in accomplishing the task of elevating the faith and the morals of the Russian people.

The group, "Living Church," has every reason to hope that the possibility of taking part in the work of the council will be given to the brethren whom you may delegate.

In directing to the one great Bishop of all Christians, the Lord Jesus Christ, our prayers for the union of all those who believe in his name, we beg you to accept our respects and our cordial fraternal greetings.

The Methodist Episcopal Church is feeling its way with great care in Russia. But who could hold back in the face of such an appeal? The three bishops resident in Europe have been authorized to investigate and to suggest methods of co-operation. It takes no great flight of faith to believe that, within the next decade, Methodism, under God, will not only be able to establish congregations that will prove centers of Scriptural holiness, but also will be an agent for the renewal of the spiritual powers of the Russian Church.

Advance projected.—It must be understood that the expanded program for Russia approved by the Methodist Episcopal Church is tentative. Such readjustments as careful study show wise will be made. But for the immediate present, to take advantage of the opportunity of this hour, the following lines of advance are contemplated:

A central plant in Moscow, with not only full equipment for church work, but a night school, a student hostel, a training school for preachers, and a small publishing plant.

A similar, but smaller, occupation in Petrograd.

Five industrial schools in various cities. Buildings to be furnished by the government; repair and equipment by the church.

Three agricultural schools, on land furnished by the government.

Deaconess hospitals in Moscow and Petrograd, with buildings furnished by the authorities.

The immediate need.—During 1925 it is proposed to carry out the following features of this program:

THE BALTIC REPUBLICS

(Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania)

THREE NATIONS: ONE PROBLEM

Between Russia and Germany.—Out of the upheaval of the World War have come the three republics along the western shore of the Baltic Sea—Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania. Formerly a part of the Russian Empire, the three seized the opportunity presented by the downfall of the Tsar to proclaim their independence and, largely under the leadership of men who have lived abroad, they are seeking a permanent place in the family of nations.

A glance at the map will show the difficulties that beset them. On the one hand looms the mighty bulk of Russia; on the other, Prussia and Poland. The latter in particular has shown her jealousy of these Baltic States and is regarded as a menace to the independence of at least one of them. Moreover, since a large part of the prosperity of these countries depends upon their carrying trade from the Baltic ports to Russia, they are in fear lest she absorb them back into herself.

Can independence be maintained?—This political condition keeps alive the debate as to whether the Baltic Republics can permanently maintain their independence. Although they are larger than such countries as Holland, Belgium, Denmark, or Switzerland, they are hardly strong enough to maintain themselves against all their neighbors. Their political future thus depends upon the outcome of present events in Europe as a whole, including the future power of the League of Nations to maintain international peace.

Whatever the issue, a new consciousness has been given to these three republics, which are bound to have, therefore, a rapid material and social development.

For this reason the large religious opportunity is not dependent upon political eventualities.

The religious situation. — While the Tsar ruled, the Greek Catholic Church was of course favored. But none of the Baltic Republics is dominantly Greek Catholic. Esthonia is no more Catholic than its kindred state, Finland. Latvia is predominantly Protestant and Lithuania Roman Catholic. It must be confessed, however, that much of the Protestantism has been largely formal.

Bishop Nuelsen has said: "The church is broken down. Both materially and spiritually the economic situation of the churches and pastors is very precarious, since the government has placed its hands on and confiscated the greater part of the funds from which the pastors received their income. The men in influential positions take no interest in church affairs and would not turn their finger to change the conditions in the churches."

In the face of this condition one finds everywhere on the part of the masses of common folk a readiness to receive the vital truths of religion. Latvia and Lithuania were part of the battleground of the war. Esthonia was used as a base for several of the expeditions launched against the bolshevist government in Russia. The relief afforded to war sufferers has won the confidence of the people. A warm evangelical message from the same source is proving its power to win their hearts.

ESTHONIA

Methodism's place.

—Two of the important ports of Esthonia—Reval, the capital and Haapsal—have already been occupied by the Methodist Episcopal Church. The occupation of this territory began in the days of the old Russian Empire, but a large increase in the work has come under Centenary auspices. In a central headquarters in Reval, work of a social as well as evangelistic nature has been begun. Particular attention is being given to needy children. As elsewhere facilities have been overloaded from the day when they were made available.

Esthonia is made up of a few Russians, a few Germans, and a mass of Esthonian peasantry who are of the same blood as the Finns. Until recently, a large part of the land has been owned by Germans known as the Baltic Barons. During the war this aristocracy seemed ready to support any side that would guarantee its position. Now the infant republic has passed an agrarian law by which estates of more than four hundred acres have been taken over by the government and let out under strict control to farmers who will be allowed to remain in possession only as long as they properly cultivate the land. The forests have likewise been taken over.

When Methodism entered this region a good many years ago, she came in mostly by the way of Germany, where her work was strongly planted. For this reason the work in Esthonia in the beginning was mainly a German-speaking work. Now, however, it is clear that primary attention must be given to the Esthonians. This will lead more quickly to an indigenous church.

Portents of success.

—While the work has hardly begun, and political conditions make it impossible to report with any accuracy as to its success, the opening of the enlarged plants at Reval and Haapsal has caught the public attention. In other centers the Lutheran churches have shown their interest by making available large auditoriums in which to hold meetings that would overflow any hall that the Methodists can now provide.

As this country has been made a separate district of the Baltic Mission, under the leadership of an Esthonian District Superintendent, it is believed that by emphasizing the social as well as the evangelistic implications of the Methodist program a large and ultimately self-supporting church will be raised up within a short period.

LATVIA

The Lettish Methodist Church.—The establishment of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Latvia constitutes one of the romantic stories of European Methodism. More than ten years ago the pastor of an independent congregation of Moravians in Libau, a leading port, discovered the Methodists through their church literature. Later he found a Methodist preacher in Riga, where an attempt was made to establish work which had to be abandoned with the outbreak of the World War.

When peace came, this Moravian pastor again put himself in communication with Methodist authorities, and in 1921 he and his entire congregation of about 150 members were formally received into the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Out of this beginning has come one of the most promising pieces of work in Europe. It must be remembered that the atmosphere of Latvia is dominantly Protestant and that there, as elsewhere, the people, dissatisfied with the mere forms of religion, are seeking a satisfactory spiritual experience.

How the work advances.—From the modest beginning in 1921 the church has gone forward rapidly. Relief work, such as that carried on in Riga, where during the school year 900 students of the university had their only substantial meal each day in the Methodist Central Mission, has convinced the people of the practical nature of the Methodist program. The constituency of the church has more than trebled.

Sunday-school development is proving as successful as in other parts of Europe. The purchase in Riga, at an unbelievably low price on account of economic depression, of a central headquarters facing a prominent park has gone far toward increasing the enthusiasm of the workers. In Libau the Methodist congregation has been moved from its little chapel (it was located between a slaughter house and glue factory) to a fine property where it will be possible to carry on an extensive social work. With a large group of native pastors already enlisted, rapid progress in Latvia seems certain.

The Catholic challenge.—The most disturbing element in the situation in Latvia is the political intrigue of the Roman Catholic Church. The country is, as has been said, overwhelmingly Protestant. Not more than one-quarter of the inhabitants can be classed as Roman Catholics, with perhaps an additional one-sixth members of the Greek Catholic communion. The rest are Protestants. In the city of Riga only eight per cent of the population is Catholic.

The Reformation came to Latvia in 1522, when John Calvin was only thirteen years old. It was confirmed in that country by Gustavus Adolphus. Yet, today, when the young republic is desperately seeking all possible sources of political stability, the Vatican has concluded an agreement whereby the Roman Catholic Church is to have a complete ecclesiastical organization, including archbishops, bishops, cathedrals, and all the rest, supported by state taxation. The church of St. James, the most famous Protestant edifice in the Baltics, has been surrendered under the terms of this agreement to the Roman Catholic Church. It will take more than a formal Protestantism to deal with a situation of this kind.

LITHUANIA

A difficult field.—In entering Lithuania the church finds itself confronting strongly entrenched Catholicism, together with a large Jewish population. At the present time the work is largely among the German-speaking inhabitants, of whom the majority have been unchurched.

The country is almost exclusively agricultural. Kovno, the capital, can hardly be said to be a city in the modern sense. Political intrigue between Poland on one hand and Russia on the other, complicated by the Lithuanian seizure of what was to have been the neutral port of Memel, makes the whole situation so confused that it is hard to outline a definite program at this time.

The churches already planted are reported as crowded to the doors, and in some places a large part of the congregation has to meet in the open air. With the return of any kind of normalcy, Lithuania should become a prosperous nation and the church should be able to carry forward an important work.

THE FUTURE AROUND THE BALTIC

What may be expected.—So rapidly is the church growing in the three Baltic Republics that, whatever the political outcome, a Methodist Conference should come into being within a short time. It may be that this will prove the center from which most effectively advance can be made into Russia. The present affords a unique opportunity in this territory. Because of economic depression, property can be secured at unbelievably low prices. This economic condition will not continue forever.

Before the war these three states were among the provinces that returned a profit toward the running expenses of the Russian Empire. Their geographical location insures that they will do the same thing again. If the Methodist Episcopal Church will take advantage of the opportunity to enter the centers now open, it will find itself in a position of large religious influence within a generation.

NORTH AFRICA

(Algeria, Tunisia, Tripoli, Cyrenaica, Morocco)

ATTACKING A MOSLEM BASE

What is North Africa?—A strip of territory along the Mediterranean including Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Tripoli, and Cyrenaica, varying from five hundred miles in depth on the west to no depth at all at the Egyptian border, offers the Methodist Episcopal Church a battleground for its North African mission. Here lives one of the hardiest of Moslem populations.

North Africa is the base from which Mohammedan advance is going forward with such power into Central Africa. In conducting Christian work here, the Methodist Episcopal Church has attacked Christianity's most vigorous rival in a supremely important position. The importance of this effort becomes more clear when it is remembered that there are no other large Protestant bodies carrying on aggressive work among Moslems in this region.

An ancient Christian base. — North Africa presents one of history's most solemn warnings to the Christian church. Fifteen hundred years ago a Christian church held this entire territory. From the time of Simon of Cyrene, who bore the cross for the Lord, until that of Athanasius and Augustine, North Africa produced towering figures in the church. But the church sank into formalism, lost its vigor, and proved an easy prey to the Arabs who carried Islam toward the West in the sixth century. Forty thousand churches were destroyed and 600 bishoprics disappeared. For 1,100 years the prophet of Mecca ruled supreme along the southern shore of the Mediterranean.

The missionary importance of North Africa.—During this long period there were many who, like Raymond Lull, that devoted missionary of the thirteenth century, felt called to a Christian crusade for the reclamation of North Africa. Various Protestant bodies and individual missionaries attempted work, but with small success. Even the Catholic missions proved disappointing.

In 1908 Bishop Hartzell aroused the Methodist Episcopal Church to enter Algeria and Tunisia. This has become the strongest Protestant work on the coast. Much of this strength is due to the isolated but deeply earnest groups of English and Scotch missionaries who preceded the Methodists and in many cases joined the missionary forces of our church.

Mohammedanism constitutes the most vigorous challenge to Christianity today.

Methodist Episcopal centers in North Africa

In Central Africa the Mohammedans are increasing among the uncivilized tribes many times faster than are the Christians. In fact, the missionary situation in Central Africa is to be conceived as a struggle with Mohammedanism rather than with paganism, with the signs at present pointing to Mohammedan victory.

As has been said, the main source of this Mohammedan advance is North Africa. Its vigor can be checked more quickly by capturing a base than by attacking the outposts. It is impossible, however, to believe that the present Christian forces in North Africa are enough to deal with the problem presented by the 15,000,000 Moslems. For the sake of Christian work throughout the world, it is imperative that the Protestant enterprise in North Africa, which is largely in the hands of the Methodist Episcopal Church, be immediately and greatly strengthened.

PRESENT-DAY NORTH AFRICA

Races and conditions.—There are almost as many racial divisions within Islam as within Christianity. Among the 15,000,000 Moslems of North Africa not more than a fourth are of Arab origin. The remainder are "Berbers" who are Caucasian descendants of the Christians conquered by the Arabs in the sixth century.

At present the Berbers are stronger than the Arabs, although so great is tradition that they do not so consider themselves. Among the Berbers the most vigorous are the hill tribes, known as the Kabyles.

In addition, there are more than a million Europeans scattered along the coast, of whom the greater part are French. Many of these are Protestants who left Alsace and Lorraine at the time of the German occupation in 1870. They thus provide a foundation for Protestant mission work in North Africa.

In some of the cities, notably Algiers, Tunis, Oran and Constantine, the European colonists are in many cases finding wealth and the native population suffering greatly in the attempt to adapt themselves to the economic requirements of a new day. In the rural regions there is immediate demand for improved methods of agriculture.

European colonies.—France, Italy, and Spain have found in North Africa scope for much of their colonial ambition. Of the three France, controlling Algeria and Tunisia with the major part of Morocco, has been the most successful. Since her entry into North Africa in 1830, she has built good roads, connected the principal cities by rail, introduced a public school system in which natives and French are trained with exact equality, and conducted agricultural experiments until it is reported that the increase in cultivation in recent years has reduced the average drought from five to four months.

During the World War, 500,000 natives of North Africa served in the trenches and munition factories. As a reward for this loyalty, citizenship in the French Republic is now offered on the same basis as to Frenchmen and, although the unrest that characterizes the Moslem world is felt, the states of North Africa have, in the main, fared so well under European control that there does not seem immediate danger of any wide-spread revolt. It should not be thought, however, that the administrations of Spain or Italy are as successful as that of France.

HOW METHODISM FACES MOHAMMEDANISM

Centers of occupation.—The great centers of Methodist work along the North African coast have been Tunis, Algiers, Constantine, and Oran. Missionaries are also stationed at Fort National, the administrative center of the so-called Great Kabylia, and Sousse.

While the program for the North African mission calls for eventual occupation of Morocco and Tripoli, it seems the part of wisdom at the present time to confine advance largely to the linking of these widely separated centers. It will be seen that these provide the natural centers from which to carry on work in Algeria and Tunisia.

Types of work.—It has been found necessary to deal with two problems in North Africa. On the one hand there are the Moslems, the most fanatical of all non-Christians. On the other are the nominal Roman Catholics who, transplanted from home, rarely have any interest in vital religion. These present a religious problem almost as difficult as that of Islam.

The government is neutral in its attitude, but the active opposition of Mohammedan and Catholic leaders precludes any hope of immediate large numerical results. This does not, however, discourage the mission from conducting work for Europeans in the large centers and for Mohammedans both in the cities and in the country towns.

In thinking of the work in North Africa, it is necessary to keep this three-fold distinction in mind, namely the city work for Europeans, the city work for Moslems and the country work for Moslems. Each requires distinctive treatment.

Portents of success.—Although the Methodist Episcopal Church has been at work in this territory less than twenty years and the number of church members in the North African Mission Conference is still small (the latest report shows a native constituency of but a little more than 200), there are victories already to be reported that have amazed missionaries among Moslems in other parts of the world.

Most impressive are the seventeen Arab and Kabyle Christian workers, with half as many more in training. No other mission in the world at work in distinctly Moslem territory has been able to secure anything like such a group of former Moslems as workers. Moreover, there is today a greater response to the work of the mission, which makes possible a fair hearing in secluded villages as well as in cities. This in itself marks an advance stage in the work.

Methods of work proposed.—To deal with the present demanding situation in North Africa it is proposed that the work in the cities be put upon an institutional basis. This will include:

1. Provision for culture and relaxation through libraries and reading rooms.
2. Provision for recreation through games, both outdoor and indoor.
3. Provision for physical culture.
4. An efficient medical department, especially for Moslems.
5. Commercial training or provision for help for those learning a trade.
6. Rooming accommodations for students, clerks, and other young men away from home.
7. Employment Bureaus.
8. Domestic science training for young women.

Building for Boys' Home, Algiers—a $10,000 Centenary project

In the country the projected program includes:

1. Model churches and community service buildings in which will be carried on such features of the city program as are found applicable to the rural problems.

2. Educational work, including

- a. A creche for abandoned or destitute babies;

- b. Homes for older children in preparation for higher grade institutions;

- c. Industrial training schools to be divided into two classes:

- (1) Elementary school with short classes teaching improved methods in native trades and arts;

- (2) Modern industrial school for the training of expert workmen who will be superior to all others in the region.

3. Agricultural schools, likewise of two classes:

- a. To teach more effective methods for use in the hill country;

- b. To teach modern agriculture to those living in the valley and plains. Research work will be a feature of these latter schools.

4. Medical work will be of two types:

- a. That conducted by a doctor from a central well-equipped dispensary, this dispensary later to develop into a hospital;

- b. Training school for nurses which will provide the personnel by which the work may be extended into village communities.

5. The teaching of domestic science, emphasizing home making, is much needed among the young women.

6. Each of our central rural stations should contain a widows' home, because of the peculiar social disabilities attaching to widowhood. In fact, it is almost impossible for a Christian widow to live in peace in a Moslem community.

7. It may seem wise to plant business schools, likewise.

Coupled with this evangelistic, educational and medical advance, there must be a large increase in production and distribution of literature. Primary consideration ought to be given to questions that are found most frequently in the Moslem mind. It is not expected that this program can be carried into effect immediately. It should, however, be undertaken as rapidly as there are workers to man it. The Methodist mission is fortunate in having men ready for this exacting work.

Teaching the boys to farm, Boys' Hostel, Tunis

The church has had sufficient experience to know that such a program will work successfully in this region. If the church envisages the importance of the North African campaign, it is certain that there will be no delay in setting up this advance.

The need.—In view of the issues at stake in North Africa, the present program seems almost pitiful in its insufficiency. It goes without saying that this will be continued. A much larger program might be projected, but during 1925 the approved plans have been held to this minimum:

Missionaries will be required for:

MADEIRA ISLANDS

PORTUGAL'S GARDEN COLONY

An Atlantic crossroads.—Off the north-west coast of Africa lie five islands—two of them inhabited—that form Portugal's garden colony. Here ocean liners stop while en route from Europe to South Africa or South America, and here tourist steamers break the voyage between America and the Mediterranean. There are probably 170,000 people in the islands, living under extremely primitive conditions, with only two or three towns of any size.

For the most part the Madeirans live in scattered houses, often little better than huts, perched on the hillsides. At least eighty per cent of them are illiterate and little is being done to remedy this condition. Drinking is a general evil, as might be expected in islands noted for their export of wine.

Wages are low but there is little incentive to earn more. Altogether the islands present the spectacle of a care-free people content with what would seem to the American or European a backward sort of life.

The familiar obstacles.—The Methodist Episcopal Church faces the same sort of difficulties in the Madeira Islands that are found in all Roman Catholic countries. Although there has been liberty of worship since the establishment of the Portuguese Republic, the power of the priesthood remains strong among the poorly educated inhabitants of the island.

The Rev. W. G. Smart tells this story: "In Santa Anna a Christian man was converted through a Bible left, many years ago, by a passing visitor. For years he held the fort alone, surrounded by hostile neighbors worked up against him by the priest. Finally he was cast out and on the scattered occasions when we could get across to visit him, we found Maciel in a straw roofed hut. He had his Bible and other books and he read them daily.

"Finally Maciel grew old and deaf. Continued persecution worked on his mind and he became mentally deranged. He believed that everyone who called at his hut meant to hurt him. When last we called at his hut in 1921, he realized who we were and seemed to come to himself. He read his portions of scriptures and with his withered hands clasped he recited the hymn which he had learned many years before. Later we found out that after this incident, of which many neighbors were witnesses, Maciel used to read the scriptures to them and they listened more readily.

"The result of years of isolation and persecution came recently. Maciel, mentally deranged, wandered out to the rocks by the seashore and either threw himself over or fell over the cliffs. He was given the burial of a dog."

One unusual difficulty in the Madeiras is the fear of the government lest the Methodist Episcopal Mission undermine the loyalty of the people. This has resulted in a law refusing sanction for any school in which there are teachers who have not had government approval. Since this approval is restricted to graduates of government normal schools, it is very difficult to find teachers who can properly fit in with the program of a Protestant mission. For this reason, it is necessary to carry on the educational work in a private and unofficial manner.

Methodism's present occupation.—The principal occupation at the present time is in the city of Funchal, the capital, in Machico, and in Mount Faith. The work is of the familiar evangelistic and educational nature. Up to the present time, there has been no medical effort.

In Funchal there is a sailors' headquarters that has done a social work of value. The distribution of the Bible and of a monthly paper, "Voz de Madeira" (Madeira Voice) has proved an evangelistic factor of importance.

Emigration has been heavy from the Madeiras recently and the Methodist work has lost many of its best converts who, because of their progressive nature, have been among the first to strike out for lands where there seem to be greater opportunities. However, there are still more than 200 members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with schools enrolling about seventy per cent, all of whom are under religious instruction.

The future of Madeira.—The program, as worked out for advance in the Madeiras, calls for the opening of schools and evangelistic work in four new points with an immediate increase in the social aspects of the work. Medical work is to be started in connection with a home for aged and children. Since, however, the elementary schools offer the key to future influence in the islands, they are to receive primary emphasis.

The immediate need.—The program approved for 1925 is as follows:

VIVID CONTRASTS

The cradle of a new Americanism.—Historic New England is today a land of striking contrasts. Overflowing cities and abandoned farms, classic halls and congested tenements, roaring factories and picturesque resorts, Mayflower descendants and foreign-speaking multitudes, poets and peasants—these are the elements which have been thrown together in one of the greatest melting pot sections of the New World.

The sweeping social, industrial, and religious changes which have taken place from the far reaches of northern Maine to the densely populated sections of Rhode Island and Connecticut fling out to the church a challenge for heroic service to win unreached and needy multitudes for Christ. A new Americanism is being cradled in the old home of Colonial tradition. The task of the church is to instil in the new life the God-fearing spirit which gripped the old.

New England's people.—The growth in population alone has been sufficient to challenge the expansive activities of the self-supporting church, while the shift of the predominant type from the native American to the European summons every denomination to aggressive and intelligent missionary service.

The six states of New England comprise one of the most heavily populated sections of the country. Here are to be found 7,400,909 people, by the 1920 census, with a gain of 848,228 registered in the decade since 1910. Of the total, 5,865,073, or 79.2 per cent, live in the cities, while 1,535,836, or 20.8 per cent, live in the small villages and open country. In other words, the urban population of New England is practically four times as large as the rural.

Located near the principal ports of entry, its growing industrialism offering employment to an ever-increasing number of workers, New England has been the destination of a large proportion of the foreign-born who have come to America. They have not only settled in great colonies in the cities, but also in the rural industrial communities. Many have gone to farming, groups of Italian, Lithuanian, Polish, and even Jewish farmers being found scattered throughout New England. More than 4,500,000, or approximately sixty-two per cent of all New England people today are foreign-born, or of foreign or mixed parentage.

Negroes are making a noticeable migration to the section, the 1920 census showing 79,051 colored people, a registered increase of 19.2 per cent being made in the decade.

Social and economic changes.—Changes in the social and economic life of New

Many are the Mayflowers that have made the New England of today

England have been many and varied during the era of its population shifts, seriously affecting the strength and accomplishments of the established churches and at the same time creating greater missionary needs. While the steady streams of European immigrants have been pouring into the cities, villages, and country, New England has been sending its own virile sons and daughters by the scores of thousands to settle the plains and conquer the mountains that stretch westward to the Pacific. Since the Civil War, the land of the Pilgrim Fathers has given to the western empires of the United States more colonists than the present population of New Hampshire and Vermont. They have builded the churches of the middle west into towers of strength—but the church “back home” has paid the price in its own life’s blood.

Changes of population also have brought illiteracy, something practically unknown in the old New England. New England has 289,700 illiterate persons or 4.9 per cent of the total population. Practically all of it is among the foreign-born. Rhode Island and Connecticut register the highest illiteracy, in excess of six per cent; and Vermont the lowest, with three per cent. The illiteracy of the native whites of Massachusetts is .4 of one per cent, while that of the foreign-born is 12.8 per cent.

A fundamental economic change is marked in the process. Not many decades ago agriculture was the dominant occupation in spite of mountains and stony soil. Today, while farming still flourishes in such sections as the Connecticut valley, large parts of Maine, and Northern Vermont, and while there is something of a revival of agriculture throughout New England, especially on the part of the foreign-born, agriculture has given over its primacy to industry. Thousands of farms have been abandoned and the rural population has decreased, while a vast network of industries has spread throughout New England, until many of the picturesque towns and villages far back in the hills have their manufacturing plants and their colonies of foreign-speaking people.

THE CHURCH AMID CHANGE

The church's new task.—Such changes in emphasis from the classic old New England of Colonial days to the New England of smoking factories and sweating toilers, from the language of the poet to the strange jargon of a myriad commingling tongues, mean that the conventional work of the church among the native-born American people will not suffice for the future. The metamorphosis brings to the church the challenge of a heterogeneity of races and of meeting the acute social and religious problems of people of differing languages, ideas, and ideals. The Methodist Episcopal Church is fitted for that transcendent task, and should be enabled to do it.

New England Methodism past and present.—Although it was the last settled section of Colonial America to be entered by the Methodist itinerant, an entrance which was resented by churches which barred their doors, New England has had written into its history the romantic story of great Methodist achievement. From this virile section of the new world came a leadership which found a rich expression in creating the organic law of the church; in the founding of the Methodist press; in expanding the work of the Methodist Book Concern; in pioneering missionary territory; and in education.

From New England came the founders of Methodist missions in Africa, in South America, in India, and in Mexico. As a matter of fact, to quote Bishop Blake, "the men who founded, or inspired the founding of Methodism in every major foreign mission field are sons of New England by birth or adoption. Isaac Owens, who laid the foundation of Methodism on the California coast; Jason Lee, who established Methodism in the Pacific Northwest; and William Case, the founder of Canadian Methodism, were New Englanders every one. It was in the city of Boston that a handful of resolute and daring women, having a vision of the needs of the world's womanhood, organized the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The story is told on page 629

The house of worship which is typical of older New England

"....New England soil may be sterile, her farms rocky, her hill sides bleak, her output poor, but as yet New England has never failed in her crop of men."

At the centennial of Wilbraham Academy, one of the speakers affirmed that Jason Lee with the group he led had determined the holding of the Oregon country within the United States and that the financial results of that missionary work would have more than endowed the colleges of Methodism.

The spirit of victory.—This spirit of New England Methodism lives today in crossroads churches of the countryside, the village houses of worship, and in the city centers which are battling destructive and oppressive conditions. It is this spirit, rather than numbers or wealth, which equips the Methodist Episcopal Church for the vast missionary task within the borders of this historic section. This spirit is at present exemplified in a small group of Portugese-speaking worshippers who dwell in the shadow of Plymouth Rock. They form a little Methodist Episcopal congregation, with no church in which to worship. In the summer time they hold divine services by the seashore, in the winter wherever they can secure a place. Their dream, for which they toil and sacrifice, is a temple of their own in which to worship God.

The vitality of present-day Methodism in New England may be noted in these facts: the number of churches has doubled and its membership has more than trebled in three-quarters of a century; Boston University, with its 10,000 students, has passed both Yale and Harvard; Boston School of Theology has graduated the largest body of theological students in the world; hundreds of little-heralded churches have sent a stream of recruits into the ranks of ministers and missionaries the world over; and the fervor of old-time Methodism still lives in sixteen successful camp meetings.

Centennial celebrations are common among New England Methodist Episcopal churches and woven into the stories of these churches are the thrills of deep devotion and sacrificial life. The Little River Methodist Episcopal Church at Columbia, Maine, in its century of life has sent six sons into the ministry. The Waitsfield, Vermont, church has contributed twelve men to Christ's service in church leadership. The Centre Methodist Episcopal Church at Malden, Massachusetts, has dedicated thirty men and women to special Christian work. It is far indeed from the little class of twelve meeting in a shoemaker's house in Malden to the present great organization of 1,400 members and supporting an annual budget of $40,000—but it is characteristic of the spirit of New England Methodism. The stories of the churches cited are not records, just illustrations.

The Methodist Episcopal story in figures.—While New England for 300 years has been the center of Congregationalism's strength, and while the hundreds of thousands of immigrants pouring in from Europe and from the French-Canadian settlements of the north have made it a great Roman Catholic stronghold, nevertheless the Methodist Episcopal Church has made a steady advance. Today it registers 174,185 members, with 1,027 pastoral charges, 1,242 church buildings, and a property valuation of churches and parsonages of $20,478,688. During 1922, the Methodist Episcopal churches of New England paid out for local expenses $4,036,488, for benevolences $1,124,383, a total of $5,160,871. Per capita giving was $29.63, next to the highest of all the geographical divisions of the United States.

THE MISSIONARY FIELD

Its variety.—An adequate program to meet the vast missionary needs of New England must be varied, indeed. Probably the greatest task for the church is in carrying personal and social evangelism into the teeming cities. Here by far the greatest number of people is to be found and the most demoralizing conditions. Here the influences that oppose the kingdom of God are concentrated and here the church finds it most difficult to upbuild the kingdom.

The marked trend toward industrialism also has produced altered conditions which have made a greater missionary task. It has meant the crowding of hundreds of thousands of the foreign-born and their large families into congested quarters of the cities; the development of working and living conditions, of insanitation and hardship, long hours and exhausting toil, the consequence of which is a situation militating against bodily and spiritual vigor. There is also a rural industrialism of factories and manufacturing plants which are strung along the railroads, rivers and water power streams. These concerns attract groups of Italians, Poles, Finns, Lithuanians, and other foreign born, who need the ministry of the church.

Industrial communities.—But the great task of the church in the industrial communities, whether large or small, is not only to improve social conditions but to bring about a spirit of Christian fraternalism among the groups. In few places in America are class lines drawn more rigidly or is feeling more intense than in the industrial sections of New England. Great problems which threaten the life of the church itself because of the unchristian spirit engendered by them are to be found in various centers. Perhaps nowhere in America has industrial strife been more relentless. Capital and labor have been at sword's points for decades. Strikes and bloodshed and bitterness are an old, old story in many mills and shops and factories. Old ideas that wealth is a possession and not a trust, that labor is a commodity and not a service are still rampant, battling the ideals of Christ which the church seeks to instil.

Colonies of Americans from other lands.—A still further field of service lies in a personal ministry to the great colonies of foreign born, both in city and country. It is not enough that material conditions be improved and that inter-group relations be mollified. Whatever the nationality or the language spoken, the church is finding a magnificent opportunity in the ministry of kindness to the foreign born, whose contacts too often have given them a perverted and sinister conception of America. By rendering aid in a myriad different ways in the Christian spirit, the forces of the church are winning the confidence and then the devotion of these strangers from many lands, which is the first step to their personal acceptance of Christ as Saviour. Thus far only a beginning has been made and the effort must be multiplied many times before the work will be commensurate with the needs.

Decadent rural sections.—Into the decadent rural fields the church must go, back into Vermont where farms are being abandoned or where foreign elements are taking them up; into the hills of Maine and New Hampshire where the emigration of the more vigorous type to the west or to the cities has left an exhausted stock. Its message must be one of revitalizing community life and revivifying the church.

The nation's playground.—A great missionary opportunity is that of the summer resorts scattered throughout New England, especially among the mountains and lakes and along the sea shore, where visitors come in throngs for several months each year. Village churches which can care for their few communicants during the other seasons find themselves swamped in the summer time, turning many away. It should not be so, because vacation time is often thought-provoking time, and is conducive to a spiritual quickening.

Bishop Hughes well exhorts visitors from other sections of Methodism and his own people as well, not to be "summer heathen" but rather to confess their Lord and encourage the small churches by regularly attending church services in the vacation period.

Student centers.—In the student centers of New England the church faces an opportunity which it must needs improve. In spite of the great industrial development, New England is still a land of cultural emphasis and strength, and its cities and towns and villages are dotted with academies, seminaries, colleges, private training schools, and universities. Here multitudes of young men and young women, not only from New England but from all over America, who are to furnish the leadership of tomorrow, are securing their education.

THE SERVICE OF METHODISM TO THE CITIES

"As go the cities."—It is well that the Methodist Episcopal Church has launched a program to capture the cities of America for Christ. For the cities, with their constantly accruing population, point that "as go the cities, so goes the nation." In few sections of the United States is there a more pressing need for a far-visioned, modern city ministry than in New England.

The southern section of New England is becoming one vast city. Rhode Island, with 97.5 per cent of its population living in cities, is the most densely settled state of the union. In Massachusetts, only five per cent live in the villages and open country, while ninety-five per cent are urban. These two states are almost as thickly populated as Belgium. The population of Connecticut is eighty-five per cent urban.

In the parish of Morgan Memorial Church,
Boston

The church faces in New England a territory where seven per cent of the total population of the United States reside, and yet which has sixteen per cent of the cities of more than 100,000 population. In other words, eleven out of sixty-eight American cities over 100,000 are in New England. Boston, with 748,000 people, is the metropolis of New England, followed by Providence, Rhode Island, with 237,595 inhabitants. The other nine cities, ranging between 100,000 and 200,000, are Cambridge, Fall River, Lowell, New Bedford, Springfield, Worcester, Bridgeport, Hartford, and New Haven.

The most vivid fact showing the growth of cities in New England is that the New England cities have grown faster during the past thirty years than the whole of New England itself. In other words, from 1890 to 1920, New England cities gained 2,725,000 in population, while New England itself only increased 2,700,000. The explanation is while the cities have been gaining 2,725,000, the country has lost 25,000 population in thirty years.

Methodism in Boston.—Boston, the metropolis of New England and a city of traditional culture and education, has become a great foreign-speaking, industrial center. Boston Common has become a meeting place for many races, while historic churches of other days find themselves surrounded by old dwellings turned into tenements swarming with Latin and Slavic peoples. Seventy-two per cent of Boston's population is of foreign birth or of foreign or mixed parentage. As it has been said, "the languages of the world are spoken on the streets of Boston, and ideas and ideals gathered from the ends of the earth are being steadily built into her social fabric."

Into this polyglot center of turbulent, toiling humanity, the Methodist Episcopal church has thrown its forces, and the effort to bring the kingdom of God to pass is well begun. Reinforcements of prayer, personnel, and resources are needed to win the victory.

Evangelism in eleven languages.—Methodism carries on its evangelistic and social program in Boston in eleven languages. The Boston Missionary and Church Extension Society and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension are related in a great city wide program by which work is carried on by seventy missionaries at twenty-three different centers. Eleven distinct racial or language groups are served. One may attend churches or missions conducted by the Methodist church where the Gospel of Christ is preached in Chinese, Lithuanian, Portuguese, Italian, Greek, Syrian, Norwegian, Danish, Swedish, German, and English. There is also a service for Jews and one for Negroes.

The story of old "First Church."—Romance and inspiration unite in the story of old First Church, Boston, which has adapted itself to serve the changing neighborhood in which it is located. Its history goes back to the summer of 1792 when Jesse Lee preached on Boston Common. In 1912, the West End Rescue Mission was founded in connection with the church, and in 1918 the Beacon Hill Community Center was organized. Located in a lodging-house section on the edge of a great foreign-speaking neighborhood, there is scarcely a spiritual or social need of the thousands who live within short walking distance of its doors which First Church does not attempt to meet by its variegated ministry. It is among the people as a servant.

Its social ministry includes classes in housekeeping, nursing, millinery, stenog-raphy, and music; it has its Boy Scouts, Camp Fire Girls, women's societies, young people's gatherings, its gymnasium and kindergarten and Bible classes, all of which fill not only every available hour, but every available inch of space. It has a constantly expanding program of spiritual regeneration and community uplift. The church maintains dormitories, a medical and dental clinic, and has a center for sailors from the Charlestown Navy Yard. Real progress is being made toward reaching this congested, cosmopolitan population for Christ.

A challenging opportunity.—Yet old First Church, one of the most majestic givers of leadership, needs that some of the life blood which it has yielded to build new churches shall flow back into its own arteries to give renewed life for its problems. A survey of its parish in the West End of Boston reveals that in two years thirty per cent of the population had shifted, and in five years seventy per cent had totally changed! In one ward, three out of four foreign-born are Russian Jews, and in another ward two out of four. Out of 260 members of First Church, only 106 live in the parish. Yet the church's share of the community responsibility embraces 405 non-Sunday-school attending Protestant children, 2,310 children of no religious affiliation, 2,719 in need of an Americanization training, and 634 illiterates! It is a field of tremendous significance because of its historical connections, its present constituency of many races and its demonstration of the adaptation of the time-honored, city residential church to meet the problems of the modern industrial city.

Italian work.—A sweep of Boston would bring into purview the five centers where the Methodist Episcopal church carries on a ministry for the thousands of Italians—one person in every twelve in Boston being an Italian. At the First Italian Methodist Episcopal Church in the formerly fashionable North End of Boston, now a congested tenement neighborhood of 30,000 Italians, between 250 and 300 children and young people are being reached by its religious, educational, social and recreational activities. A summer camp and a daily vacation Bible school are conducted. There is a well graded Sunday school, each class of which is organized as a club, meeting week days. The Sunday school carries on a program of religious education throughout the week.

Lithuanian work.—In the old St. John's Methodist Episcopal Church of South Boston, at one time having a membership of more than a thousand, there worships today a Lithuanian congregation, with a former priest as its minister. There are 8,000 Lithuanians in South Boston and 12,000 in the entire city. Three Sunday schools are maintained for the Chinese, the oldest at the Old Broomfield church, now absorbed into the new United Church. In ten years, forty-four Chinese have been converted in this one school, one of whom was graduated recently from Boston University. Others are scattered throughout the world.

Negro work.—A work for Negroes is conducted by the Woman's Home Missionary Society at the Hattie B. Cooper Community Center in connection with the Fourth Methodist Episcopal Church. The program ranges from dressmaking class and choral clubs to Sunday school and Epworth League. For lack of space, the Sunday school must meet in three sections. Though inadequate, it is the only Negro Methodist church in the city.

Morgan Memorial Church.*—No story of Methodism in Boston, New England or the United States would be complete without the mention of Morgan Memorial. Here the Gospel is applied to modern life! Here was founded the Goodwill Industries, and here several hundred regularly employed and "opportunity workers" are kept busy.

A social ministry and program of religious education are carried on which reaches the thousands, young and old, every year. Here also are English-speaking, Italian, Syrian, Portuguese, and Negro departments. Once a month these various departments and their ministers join in an "international service." Fifteen hundred children of twenty-five nationalities are ministered to in the children's settlement. Twenty-eight different languages are spoken within a mile of this church.

Boston a pattern for New England.—The problems and activities of Boston as here chronicled are the problems and activities of the other cities of New England on a smaller scale. Important beginnings are registered among the hundreds of thousands of foreign-speaking peoples scattered elsewhere. In Lowell, Mass., there is work for the Greeks and Syrians in the factories. At Manchester, N. H., there is a French Methodist Episcopal church, the only one in New England, ministered to by an engineer who is employed in industry six days a week. There are important pieces of Italian Methodist work at Portland, Maine, Middletown and New Haven, Conn., Providence, R. I., Barre, Vt., and Fall River, Mass.

Wesleyan Association Building, Boston—Methodist headquarters

Among the 100,000 Portuguese in New England a splendid program of missionary activity is being carried on at East Cambridge, Plymouth, New Bedford, East Wareham and other points in Massachusetts, and at Valley Falls, and other centers in Rhode Island.

Here also is published "Aurora," a Methodist Portuguese paper of large circulation.

Bishop Hughes has said, "If we consider Boston University, the Deaconess Hospital, and Morgan Memorial, it is apparent that no Protestant church is

*See picture on p. 235.

While they make over old shoes, they are themselves remade by productive employment—Goodwill Industries, Morgan Memorial, Boston today doing more or better work in New England than is the Methodist Episcopal. We need a representative and outstanding church in the city. We have the funds for getting it and we are trying to get the wisdom and the patience for the enterprise."

Typical new program churches.—A successful "melting pot" church is the Central Methodist Episcopal of Lowell, whose program is partially sustained by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension. Here six years ago the work

Our church at Hamden Plains, Connecticut, (new residential section of New Haven) was alert to the problems of rapid suburban growth, and, with Centenary help, put up this adequate plant was at so low an ebb it seemed the church would have to close. Today, under an adequate leadership, will be found nine nationalities represented in the church activities. There are Greeks, Chinese, Armenians, Syrians, White and Negro Americans, Germans, Irish and French. Syrians, French, Greeks, and Americans can be found kneeling together at the same communion service. Public worship, Sunday school, Epworth League, and prayer meeting are all well attended. A Syrian school of sixty boys and girls is carried on in connection with Central Church.

The meteoric growth of modern city suburbs often throws out a challenge too great for the local church to meet. Such was the situation in Hamden Plains, one of the newer residential sections of New Haven, Conn. Hamden Plains increased 15,000 in population in two or three years, most of the newcomers being workers in nearby industrial plants. The Methodist Episcopal Church at large co-operated with the faithful congregation to meet the challenge, and a splendid church was built. On the day of dedication, a large number of people was received into membership. Already the congregation and Sunday school crowd the building to the doors.

Goodwill Industries.—Two of the Goodwill Industries of the Methodist Episcopal Church are located in New England, at Boston and Lowell, Mass. More than fifteen years ago, a praying and far-visioned pastor saw the need of helping discouraged and desperate homeless men to help themselves. He conceived the idea of collecting cast-off clothing, broken furniture, and other articles, reconstructing them and selling them at a low price, furnishing employment to unfortunates, and establishing a partially self-supporting enterprise to help others. So marvellous has been the success that today at Morgan Memorial, the Goodwill Industries occupy two large six-story buildings and about 5,000 needy people find self-respecting employment every year.

The Goodwill Industries at Lowell are located in an industrial city of more than 120,000 people, of whom eighty per cent are foreign born or of foreign or mixed parentage.

Self-sustaining churches.—Many achievements might also be registered of English-speaking churches which are winning out against the difficulties of the modern city. For instance, the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Manchester, N. H., nearly doubled its membership in two years, increased its Sunday-school enrolment until it is one of the largest in New Hampshire, built a splendid church and community center and entered upon a program to meet the many varied spiritual and social needs of its neighborhood.

METHODIST SERVICE TO RURAL NEW ENGLAND

Agricultural New England.—A narrative of abandoned farms and decreasing rural populations is not a pleasant one, nor is it conducive to an optimistic frame of mind. Yet there are phases of agricultural New England which are distinctly hopeful.

Decreasing population means a devitalized country church. The movement west or to the cities of much of the more vigorous Yankee stock of rural New England has robbed many a historic, virile country church of its very life strength. It has meant that many churches should die, and hundreds of them have, or they should become missionary projects. One abandoned church is now being used by the village fire department. A boy in a village with closed churches directed some tourists to the graveyard as "the liveliest place in town."

A new rural people.—Another problem is that of the incoming foreign element which is not of a Protestant type. The situation in Vermont is described by the Department of Rural Work of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension: "It is reported by two mail carriers from one community that in the past half dozen years eighty-six changes have taken place in farms and all but six of these have passed into the hands of Roman Catholics.

Today's investment for tomorrow among the Portuguese. A student from Boston University teaches this Sunday-school class Either actual abandonment of farms is still in process or the land is passing into the hands of a non-Protestant population. In either case, the result is likely to be an actual decrease in Protestant church membership."

Foreign-speaking peoples on farms.—Scarcely a section of New England is there but what is feeling these inroads by foreign-speaking peoples. The French-Canadians are coming in by the thousands from the north to settle on the farms as well as in the cities; the Italians, Poles, and Lithuanians are pushing out from the congested city settlements, some of them to return to their old-country occupation of farming, others to engage in the village industries. This rural industrial situation is an important one in New England, as represented in the fishing villages along the coast and the mill towns back in the interior. Practically all of these rural communities with their small factories and foreign-speaking people present a peculiar social problem which the church must meet and solve. But without adequate equipment and trained leadership little progress is possible.

Living and dying churches.—Hundreds of churches of various denominations are serving their own limited constituencies, and with programs unadapted to modern needs and with decreasing memberships and support are steadily making their way to the ecclesiastical graveyard. But other churches are awake to the difficulty of New England's rural problem and its various manifestations and are successfully solving it.

Methodist leadership.—The hope of New England's rural Methodism heads up largely in the splendid rural leadership courses provided by Boston University and its School of Theology in co-operation with the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension. Here the dignity and opportunity of the rural parish are emphasized, and methods developed and taught for successful country church work in the various types of communities. A circulating library for the rural pastors is widely used.

Demonstration parishes are chosen and the program inaugurated, so as to afford

It is high strategy to train the leaders of foreign-speaking groups in a Christian college—Foreign-speaking students at Boston University illustration and inspiration for the scores of churches which are falling short of their task. The results of this kind of demonstration work are seen in Gardner Centenary Parish in Massachusetts, where a program started three years ago has continued to develop until the missionary appropriation has been reduced from $6,000 to $1,000 annually.

The summer school for town and country pastors, conducted at Boston University by the department of rural work of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, brings together aggressive and forward-looking ministers in rural fields for training in the most successful methods for reaching the various types of rural communities.

Success illustrated.—Another striking example is the new epoch in the life of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Grantham, N. H., a little hamlet off the railroad. Under the leadership of a trained and energetic pastor, a community house was built, with social rooms, an auditorium and other equipment. A community program was inaugurated which has made the church the center of the life of the village and surrounding country. Already a new vision of what service means and the resultant helpfulness are putting a new spiritual viewpoint in the life of the entire neighborhood.

Upton, Massachusetts, is a village which has the problems of a rural industrial community. Young women come in from the country to work in the straw goods factory. There was little social life of a helpful type and the Methodist Episcopal church was static. Even when a new minister came, there was little enthusiasm. But his contact with the rural leadership program enabled him to inaugurate a campaign of rejuvenation of church and community. Within four months it was the liveliest church in town, with a large class of men, an energetic group of young women, a vested choir, a new parsonage and a trebled budget. A community house also was purchased and equipped by an organized community council, of which the pastor was a member, and the amusements of the neighborhood were brought to a higher plane.

In another rural industrial community, the Methodist pastor held noonday meetings in the factory, later establishing Sunday afternoon services in the mill for the workers. A social program for them also was initiated. Their interest and confidence were won on a large scale and a large number became members of the church.

Evangelism the keynote.—Evangelism plays an important, successful part in the advance of the Methodist Episcopal church in New England. Not only is this true in the self-supporting churches, but also in the missionary activities. A foreign-speaking evangelist is employed by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension to labor among the Portuguese of the fishing villages along the coast and in other settlements. Another foreign-speaking evangelistic effort is among the Italians of Portland, Maine.

An unusual experiment was carried out in Vermont, where four centers were visited with a religious chautauqua. Ten churches were given a vision of community responsibility, four young men recruited for life service, 320 young people definitely related to the churches and Sunday schools, and other facts of great progress registered. Scores of the unchurched were brought to the church. A new type of rural evangelism was recently inaugurated by the equipping of a motor truck with religious literature, including testaments, miscellaneous pamphlets and church papers. Two evangelists are making a tour of rural New England for itinerant preaching and visiting.

THE MINISTRY OF THE W. H. M. S.

Methodist women at work.—Several women are serving as pastors or special workers in the rural fields of New Hampshire and are doing excellent missionary work. One is a local preacher and a licensed deaconess and serves a widely scattered population of 500, covering a territory as large as Rhode Island. Another is leading a group of 100 or more into a deeper spiritual life through the medium of a well-developed social program.

Missionary activities of a widely varied nature are carried on by the Woman's Home Missionary Society. Among the Italian granite workers at Barre, Vermont, a deaconess home and chapel are located. The deaconesses carry on in the community a social and religious work, including domestic science and industrial classes, mothers' meetings, Sunday school, and vesper services. Aid is given in the support of a woman worker among the Italians at Oaklands, Methuen, Mass., and in the maintenance of a daily vacation Bible school at St. Paul's church, Lawrence, Mass. A most notable activity is among the Negroes at Boston, with a diversified and extensive program of social and religious service.

The society also maintains the East Boston Immigrants' Home, where many needy and pathetic cases of newcomers to a strange land are cared for. In addition, the Boston Medical Mission gives thousands of treatments annually to suffering, needy patients, with an influence radiating throughout the city. In an educational way, the Society maintains the Dwight Blakeslee Memorial Training School, located at New Haven, Conn., a national school of the organization. It is a training school for Christian work. The Training

The Methodist Episcopal Church has Deaconess work at the following places: Gardiner and Portland, Maine; Barre, Vermont; Boston, Concord, Haverhill and Fall River, Massachusetts; Providence and Pawtucket, Rhode Island; and New Haven, Connecticut. It partakes of a varied educational and social service nature.

TRANSIENTS

Ministering to visiting throngs.—In order to meet the tremendous opportunity for a ministry to transients, visitors and summer tourists, the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension in a forward look has aided in the enlargement and equipment of some of the village summer-resort churches. One small village chapel was remodelled and equipped to render a ministry to hundreds of vacationists. In a Massachusetts town, an appropriation encouraged the construction of a splendid church building and community center. An all year-round social and religious program serves the village and its permanent residents and in the summer thousands of tourists are reached with the spiritual ministry of the church. Scores of other coast towns and inland lake and mountain villages which are fast growing in popularity are not so equipped, however, and must have missionary support if they are to serve the opportunity which confronts them.

MINISTRY OF TEACHING

Majestic educational records.—In the field of education, New England Methodism takes a high place. What with Wilbraham Academy, the oldest of our educational institutions, and its six sister academies; with Wesleyan University and its notable record of leaders furnished for the world's religious and scientific life and progress, among them more than sixty college presidents, thirteen bishops, hundreds of pastors, missionaries, teachers, editors, scientists, statesmen and lawyers; Boston University, and its monumental contribution to both New England and the world, with a similarly eminent record of training leadership and with more than 1,000 out of its present 10,000 students preparing for twenty different forms of religious work—the record and the promise are both wonderful!

The Christian culture, education, and inspiration which have come from these world-known centers of learning, and from those other meritorious educational institutions of which New England Methodism is proud, have left their mark on the lives of thousands. (See the map on page 248.)

If a growing Methodism can enlarge their activities and provide the spiritual and material resources for their development, the result in the advancement of the kingdom of Christ will be worth the cost many times.

Twentieth century religious education.—Through a unique program of cooperation between the Board of Education, the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, and Boston University and its School of Theology, an extensive program of religious education has been developed in Boston which is eminently successful and nationally known. Boston and vicinity furnish a laboratory where nearly all conceivable religious problems and social situations can be met and solved. Students not only receive instruction in the class room and from textbooks, but have actual experience in their chosen field of work under the supervision of trained leaders, for which experimental work academic credit is given.

Four hundred twenty-five students received this training last year. Among them were sixteen bi-lingual workers, equipped for a ministry in a foreign tongue and the English language, five Italians, one Russian, one Lettish, three Greeks, four Portuguese, one Lithuanian, and one Syrian. Ten students in the School of Theology were preparing for ministry in down-town city churches, and forty-five students for rural church leadership. Thirty students were in training for foreign mission work, and a large number in the School of Religious Education.

Wesley Foundations.—The work of the Wesley Foundations and the social and religious service of university pastors and ministers in college community churches register a tremendous contribution by Methodism to educational and spiritual advancement in New England. Expansion of present work will mean winning more and more young men and women who are to be the leaders of the future. Among these New England centers where Methodism is thus functioning are the University of Maine at Orono, the New Hampshire College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts at Durham, the University of Vermont at Burlington, Harvard University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology at Cambridge, the Massachusetts Agricultural College at Amherst, and Yale University at New Haven, Conn.

Guiding New England's youth.—Religious educational work, which is having a far-reaching effect among the young men and young women and the boys and girls of New England, has the experienced help of the Board of Sunday Schools and the Board of the Epworth League. Direct aid in leadership and literature is furnished to hundreds of Sunday schools and Epworth Leagues in the self-supporting churches as well as in the missionary centers.

In special ways, the impact of these agencies of the church is being felt throughout New England. Sunday-school missionaries toiling in the rural neighborhoods where spiritual life has declined almost to the vanishing point, in the fishing villages where spiritually impoverished boys and girls are found, are carrying forward the redemptive work of Christ. The churches of New England in a peculiar way are very much alive to the primacy of the teaching method, and the way is open for a much larger program of teacher training, Sunday-school development and week-day instruction in religion.

Young people's institutes.—Summer and winter institutes of a widespread and successful nature are characteristic of the Epworth League in New England. In 1922, eight summer institutes were held, to which came hundreds of virile young people for inspiration and training. Many were of the far-famed old Yankee stock, others of the cosmopolitan type which is building the new industrial New England. The New England conference conducted the largest number of mid-winter institutes, eight, in any one conference. The Boston and Portland districts have undertaken the support of student missionaries. In New England, outstanding successful Junior League programs in connection with camp meetings have been conducted.

MINISTRY OF HEALING

Servants of mercy.—Not in the fields of missionary expansion and religious education alone does the Methodist Episcopal Church function in New England. In a ministry of philanthropy and healing, it brings comfort to those stricken in body, help to the unfortunate and care for the aged and the orphan. Through the Board of Hospitals and Homes and the General Deaconess Board, the institutions as listed on the map on page 252, are related to the great Methodist Episcopal Church at large. Their service, which touches thousands of lives annually for good, can not be measured, but only mentioned, here. Other deaconess work is also carried on among the city churches, in neglected rural fields, in settlements, and in the myriad miscellaneous ways that these noble women serve in the name of Jesus Christ. The New England Deaconess Association functions particularly in an extensive service in and around Boston.

OTHER MINISTRIES

Other Methodist agencies.—The work of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals, and of the Board of Conference Claimants, which is national and yet not institutional, is not easily catalogued by geographical divisions. Suffice it to say, however, that they function for the entire church in New England as well as in the rest of the nation.

The Bible in New England.—Bible distribution is carried on extensively throughout New England through the American Bible Society, Methodism's appointed agency for that work. In New England the direct work of circulation is through state societies. Last year the Massachusetts Bible Society furnished Scriptures in forty-three different languages. The Society seeks to place a Bible in the hands of every Sunday-school pupil and to supply every missionary worker with Scriptures as needed. The ultimate program calls for regular colporteurs on salary and for special workers, such as students during vacation and part time workers for special campaigns, and for circulating the Scriptures in every tongue spoken in New England.

NEW ENGLAND'S NEED

Methodism's heroic achievements in the life of New England can not be viewed against the background of the colossal changes in that historic center without revealing that here is a world mission field.

The need is for greater and better equipment; for more and better trained leaders; for prayers and consecration of givers and servants alike; for faith that the task can and will be done, if the spirit of Christ grips His people and if loyalty to His ideals become a part of every life.

The task made concrete.—Aside from the needs of the institutions and agencies already indicated, the list of critical situations in New England calls for churches in industrial centers surrounded by polyglot peoples; for new mission centers in rural industrial communities of Portuguese and Italian people; and for continuing successful experiments of re-establishing our work in rural agricultural communities. The task grows greater as illustrations of the types of need are revealed.

In Maine, the unchurched Protestants outnumber those in church by five to one, and in Massachusetts by three to one. Four hundred thousand more Protestant children are out of Sunday school in New England than are in Sunday school. Surely the challenge to Methodism is to "go forward!" in New England with all the historic missionary zeal which has brought it to its commanding place in the Christian world.

On the one hand, the city stands for all that is evil—a city that is full of devils, foul and corrupting; and, on the other hand, the city stands for all that is noble, full of the glory of God, and shining with a clear and brilliant light.

LYMAN ABBOTT

MIDDLE ATLANTIC STATES

THE WORLD IN AMERICA

The Statue of Liberty is the keeper of the gate to the City of All Nations. The City of All Nations, in turn, is the portal to a land which has gathered in its fold the millions from the near and far-flung corners of the earth.

The concentration of the nationalities has naturally taken place at the gateway—so New York City is the foreign-speaking center of America. From there the spread has been fan-shaped, sweeping from New England's shores across New York state and Pennsylvania, into the more distant states, and to the coast of New Jersey.

The immigrant today who leans far out over the rail of the incoming ship to catch his first glimpse of the Statue of Liberty outlined against the sky, to trace along the horizon the skyline of the Wonder City, and to thrill with the surcharge of new life in a new world of undreamed opportunity—that immigrant may be from the industrial center of England, from strife-torn Ireland, from ravaged Poland, from hungry Austria, from mysterious Russia, or from sunny Italy. It matters not, because he soon will be at home—he will find in the Middle Atlantic states, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, great numbers of his own countrymen.

An immigrant's journey.—Let the New American journey through the environs of the adjacent states. At the threshold of his pilgrimage lies the City of New York itself, the first city of America and, in many ways, the first of the world. The vastness, the strangeness, the apparent incomprehensibility of it will awe him, just as it does the native Americans.

Here the New American will discover 5,600,000 people center-

ing their lives—the factories, offices, mills, and shops where they work, the tenements and palaces where they dwell, the glittering theaters and the dingy dance halls where they amuse themselves, and sundry churches where they worship. Greater New York has more people than the states of California, Oregon, and Washington. It has a population as large as the next three largest cities combined: Chicago, Philadelphia, and Detroit.

Traveling “upstate.”—The journey of the New American may bear him out beyond the confines of Greater New York, up the historic Hudson, to the rest of the Empire State. In the northern part he will find thousands of French settlers who have migrated from Canada, taken up farms, or settled in cities. In the northeastern portion is one of the pleasure resort sections of America, where thousands come to see the picturesque beauties of the Adirondacks and the Catskills, and to spend their vacation season.

He will travel through fertile farming regions, where fruits and grains grow in abundance. Here much of the old American stock is to be found—the characteristic Empire State type before the inundation from foreign shores. In some sections Italians and other foreign-speaking peoples are established on farms, introducing a new rural type. They are in colonies in the “up-state” cities also, especially in the industrial centers. Many cities will be visited which are still predominantly of the native American type, cities of fine homes, splendid churches, and widely-known colleges and universities.

From the Lackawanna steel works on the Lake Erie border of Buffalo to the great manufacturing plants at Niagara Falls stretches the twenty-five mile “Niagara Frontier,” one of the most highly organized industrial regions of America. The development of this region has hardly begun, although it now produces a more varied assortment of goods than any similar portion of the United States, with the exception of New York. Abundant power is supplied by the Falls; lake steamers bring raw materials at low cost; easy access is given to foreign and domestic markets by railroads, a barge canal, and, in time, the St. Lawrence-to-the-Atlantic steamship canal.

Visiting Pennsylvania.—If the New American makes his pilgrimage a “swing around the circle”, he will drop southwest from Buffalo and enter “the Pittsburgh District”, another vast industrial region, the steel center of the world. Here, too, are great colonies of foreign-speaking people employed in the steel mills, and in the related coke and coal industries.

From Chestnut Ridge of the Allegheny mountains, he will see stretched out before him more than two hundred company-owned mining towns ranging from a few hundred to several thousand polyglot peoples—all this where once was an ordinary, peaceful farming region.

In the northern part of Pennsylvania, the visitor would find a rural section of the old type; in central Pennsylvania a heavy industrial and mining region; and in the southeastern part the most fertile and best developed agricultural section of the state. The whole north-eastern portion forms the vast anthracite mining region, with its hundreds of thousands of underground toilers mostly foreign-speaking Slavs.

Studying Philadelphia.—The climax of his visit to Pennsylvania would bring him to Philadelphia, third city of America. Here he would discover the center of 1,823,000 people, a city of rich historical tradition, and a great industrial and commercial metropolis. In the shadow of Independence Hall he would find swarming multitudes speaking tongues strange to the fathers of America. He would find a city of great churches, and yet a city where many thousands are unreached by the social or spiritual ministry of any church.

Touring New Jersey.—The pilgrimage to New Jersey would take the New American to the congested foreign-speaking centers of Newark, Jersey City, and Hoboken. He would find happy and contented suburban residential towns but each one with its handful of "foreigners", and scores of industrial communities large and small. A side-trip south would bear him through the central portion of the state, a backward, unfertile rural section, where dwell the celebrated "pineys"—an ignorant, illiterate, and superstitious group living in the shadow of some of the greatest cities of the world. All of southern New Jersey is the dairy and market garden for New York, Philadelphia, and adjacent cities. The native American population is interspersed with numerous rural Italian colonies, and a few Jewish agricultural communities. Along the coast is a continuous stretch of summer resorts, Atlantic City being known to America and all the world.

A PANORAMA OF COMPLEXITY

Surveying the field—If, at his journey's end, the New American should make a study of these Middle Atlantic states, he would learn that their total population is 22,261,144 people, of whom 16,672,595, or 74.9 per cent are urban—living in cities of 2,500 or more—and 5,588,549, or 25.1 per cent, are rural. Of the total, 4,912,575 are foreign-born, and 600,183 Negro. The striking fact is that while the net increase in population for the Middle Atlantic states, between 1910 and 1920 was 15.2 per cent, a trifle higher than the United States at large, the foreign-born increase was only 1.8 per cent, while the Negro increase was 43.6 per cent.

The principal foreign-born elements and their number, are as follows: English, 272,752; Irish, 472,319; German, 508,226; Polish, 515,708; Austrian, 310,844; Hungarian, 190,224; Russian, 763,891; Italian, 925,222; and Czecho-Slovaks, 123,863. The section contains more English, Irish, Polish, Austrian, Hungarian, Russian and Italian people than any other section of the United States. Pennsylvania has the largest Negro population, 284,568.

The city's challenge.—The Middle Atlantic states, the greatest city area of America, naturally presents the city as its greatest problem. What is the problem of the city? Pre-eminently it is the submergence of humanity and personality in the depths of crass materialism. Competition at its keenest, selfishness in its most intense form, the struggle for a living the severest—all these are but phases of that materialism. In New York, the metropolis, it heads up in its most virulent form. Its overwhelming magnitude, its seething multitudes, the maddening craze for amusements, the perpetual motion of the swirling mass, the deadening monotony of its work, the cold-blooded materialism of its thinking, the maelstrom of its loneliness, its every known variety of humanity, the multi-family dwellings, money lure and "working papers", and finally the class cleavages, these are some of the conditions of city life that try men's souls. The analysis of it is made vivid in a recent study entitled, The Case for Old New York.¹

Things hopeful.—Set over against these destructive elements are some hopeful characteristics:

The upward striving of the city masses: everywhere there is seething discontent with present conditions.

The passion of the new Americans for education: public schools are jammed with eager learners of many races; college and university enrolments tell the same story; educational work of churches and settlements brings a great response.

The emotional temperament and the generous benevolence of New York people.

A world mission field.—New York has become a world mission field. The moral and spiritual resources for its own advancement and regeneration are not available within its own borders. The evangelization of New York is a task for America. As the greatest city New York presents the greatest missionary opportunity. No greater task faces the church of America today than the spiritual conquest of its cities. The situation in New York is duplicated, to a lesser degree, in a hundred other metropolitan centers throughout the United States, every one of which is a challenge to the church. Indeed, in some centers of smaller population, certain given social conditions are worse, due to the fact that New York as a municipality has taken the lead in ameliorating many evils.

The industrial field.—Industrialism, with the social and economic conditions which it engenders, is woven into the life of these three states. In fact, the Middle Atlantic states along with New England form the industrial heart of America. It may be in the cities, in the town or rural industrial regions, the problems are much the same.

Class distinctions, misunderstandings, bitterness, congested housing, lack of recreational facilities, social and economic poverty, exhausting toil, long hours (the twelve-hour day still lives), and spiritual stultification—all these arise concurrently with an intensified industrialism. There are few sections of New York, New Jersey, or Pennsylvania which are not touched with it to lesser or greater degree. Here in the past has been industrial warfare, marked by bloodshed and no quarter. In some places some of the strife has subsided. But the provocative conditions have not been removed. In some industries, great progress has been made in reconciliation of capital and labor and in the realization of brotherhood in toil. Little has been registered in these eastern mining regions. The barbaric rule of exploitation is still to be found. As this is being written, 60,000 men of southwestern Pennsylvania are still on strike fighting for standard conditions of labor and wage scale. Their families have spent the winter huddled in tents in the snow, while a family of seven, a typical family, had to get along on the union allowance of $4.25 a week.

New rural types.—The spread of foreign-speaking peoples into the countryside—for most of the immigrants were farmers in Europe—creates a situation of two angles: first, it is a problem to the individual rural church, which finds its native American constituency being replaced by a foreign-speaking, non-Protestant element; second, it is an opportunity to the church at large to evangelize the foreign-born under favorable surroundings, that is, it is easier to reach him in the open, rural regions than in the congested city colonies where the very mass overwhelms.

The American farmers are progressive and co-operative, while the rural churches are often static, only a few modern programs having been developed in the last four or five years. The foreign-speaking farmers generally work by intensive farming, acreage that American farmers do not find profitable. Trained leadership and community programs and equipment are necessary to revive the stagnant farm life and to meet the changing needs where foreign-speaking peoples are replacing the native American. An increasing missionary problem is involved in the process, as more of these rural churches are constantly coming for help to the church at large.

Other problems.—Summer resorts with their transient populations, especially in the mountain and lake regions of New York and Pennsylvania and the coast of

The Ford brings the missionary and the missionary brings a helpful service to the Italian farmers of South Jersey

New Jersey, repeat the opportunities and problems of other resort communities, likewise, the student centers found in abundance throughout these heavily populated states, especially in and around New York and Philadelphia. The small fruit and vegetable industries in fields, orchards and canneries bring thousands of immigrant workers, especially women and children, into the small villages and open country from the cities, creating an abnormal social life that challenges both local and general leadership.

Methodism at work.—In this vast crucible, the Methodist Episcopal Church is toiling with vigor and vision to invest it with spiritual devotion. It is no stranger seeking a domicile in a strange land. Rather, it has grown up with the people and become a part of their life.

Methodism dates back to Revolutionary days in this historic area, the circuit rider sharing the hardships and the tribulations of the early pioneers and through his courageous ministry built himself into the very life of the colonies. He journeyed across the mountains and conquered the forests with the vanguard of civilization. It is fitting, therefore, that the church he represented should be known as a church of the people.

Living witnesses.—Such has the Methodist Episcopal Church of the Middle Atlantic states continued to be. Old-fashioned, white houses of worship which have stood for a century in rustic sections of New York and Pennsylvania testify to Methodism's ministry to the traditional American type descendent from early days. Great temples in the cities, with towering spires, magnificent organs and throngs of well-dressed people, tell the story of how Methodism is beginning to adapt herself to the demands of twentieth century metropolitan centers. Mission halls in the underworld sections, settlement houses where children fight for breathing space and where poverty hangs like a fog over life, institutional churches where the social need is great and recreational life is stunted, conventional churches in normal residential districts, rural community churches, flourishing congregations in town and country, orphanages, hospitals, old people's homes, colleges, academies, universities, all these, and more, reveal how the Methodist Episcopal Church is growing and changing with the communities as they have been wrought into the vast new empire of the Middle Atlantic states.

The church today.—In 1922 there were 885,096 full members on the roll of the church in the Middle Atlantic states, and it had 4,834 church buildings. The Sunday-school enrolment was 1,021,321, while the Senior Epworth League had 117,006 members and the Junior Epworth League 55,457. The total benevolences were $5,665,287, while the total paid for all purposes was $22,678,311, or $25.62 per capita. This is the fourth highest rate of giving among Methodist Episcopal churches of the nine census divisions of the United States.

Institutions of service.—In the present register of Methodism in the Middle Atlantic states will be found three colleges and universities, one theological seminary, eight secondary schools and two training schools; student work maintained at seven non-Methodist educational institutions, including some of the leading universities of America; thirty-five summer schools and missionary institutes of various types; and twenty-five hospitals, orphanages, and homes for the aged and infirm.

METHODISM AT THE FRONT

How the Methodist Episcopal Church is measuring up to the mountainous task in this industrial heart of America can only be indicated here. A survey or comprehensive study of its service would require volumes to portray. A few of the high lights may serve to illuminate the whole picture.

The mission field of New York City.—In a population where every third person is a Roman Catholic, every fourth person a Jew, and every hundredth person is a Methodist, there are only fifty-two Methodist Episcopal churches to carry on the denomination's share of evangelizing the 3,000,000 people in Manhattan and the Bronx. In greater New York, with its 5,620,000 people, there are only 140 Methodist Episcopal Churches.

Metropolitan Temple stands in a parish of 90,000 people. A canvass of twenty-six blocks nearest the church located 400 unchurched Protestant families, from whom 200 new members for the church were secured. The church has a Spanish membership of 100, and has a varied program of community and welfare service.

"Always Open."—With a blazing electric cross to carry its message to the passing throngs of pleasure-seekers on Broadway just "ninety-nine steps away," the widely known Union Methodist Episcopal Church is Methodism's great effort to meet the challenge of the hotel and theatre center of the world's greatest city. Here the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has represented the church at large in a program to serve the passing thousands. Its possibilities, as seen by the New York City Society, are a pulpit for Methodism's greatest preacher; a social and religious clinic; an interpreter of the art and idealism of the great metropolis; the travelers' New York City church; a complete neighborhood service, regardless of profession or occupation; a Christian colony of volunteer workers resident in the property; a meeting place for kindred assemblies; a center of friendship for the lonely; a civic and religious forum; and a center of popular education.

The Church of All Nations.—In the heart of a tenement district where hundreds of thousands of many nations swelter in summer and freeze in winter, the Methodist Episcopal Church has developed a tremendous center of friendship and help. It is well named the Church of All Nations, because in this concentrated section of the lower East Side, where 416,000 people are huddled, 97½ per cent of them are of foreign birth or parentage. Historically, the church represents at least eight strong and influential Methodist Episcopal churches, many of them with a membership of 1,000 or more in the days when the population was native American which moved away or closed the churches with the influx of foreign hordes. The Church of All Nations stands as the last outpost in the wilderness, and of it is said that "nowhere in this country does the Methodist Episcopal Church face so gigantic a task in the evangelization of new Americans as at this center."

Through the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension and the New York City Society, there has recently been dedicated an equipment equal to any for settlement and home missionary work. The new main building, supplementing the five-story tenement house in use so long, will be able to minister to thousands of needy people in varied ways, from the physical benefits of a gymnasium and open-air roof and the educational opportunities of the class rooms, to the religious service of the chapel.

The work at present includes organized social and religious activities in three foreign languages, Russian, Italian, and Chinese. A program of religious education reaches several hundred people, while the recreation program serves many more. English is taught to the foreign-born. There is a daily kindergarten of fifty little children. Here the Russian Collegiate Institute conducts a program for 250 students each winter. The Chinese Mission in Chinatown is a department. There are a fresh-air summer home for tired mothers and children, a Daily Vacation Bible School, and Sunday religious services.

St. James Church.—St. James Methodist Episcopal Church is in a community of 35,000 people who were thought to be entirely unapproachable to the Protestant work. A thorough survey located 4,000 Protestants having no membership within a radius of four blocks of the church. The staff has been enlarged and twenty-nine different activities are on the week-day schedule, with special emphasis on personal evangelism and religious education.

Methodism's premier Italian center.—In the midst of an Italian colony of 100,000 people in New York stands the Jefferson Park Methodist Episcopal Church, carrying on the greatest Italian social and religious work which American Methodism knows. It consists of an adapted church building, the Wood Memorial Casa del Popolo Community House, and a Fresh Air Home. It is a community and religious center ministering to 15,000 people a month.

Forty activities are on the weekly calendar, including Americanization classes, industrial classes for boys, cooking and sewing classes for girls, Boy Scouts, Girl Scouts, organized athletics and recreation, lectures, moving pictures, a children's assembly, and vesper service Sunday afternoons attended by from 800 to 1,000 weekly, a day kindergarten, and special preparatory membership classes.

A church of many peoples.—Situated in a single city block in which dwell over 2,500 men, women, and children, who speak twenty different languages, is the People's Home Church and Settlement. No other work in New York is so intensive in its character. From the children who fill the surrounding tenements and swarm into the streets after school hours, the church takes boys and girls and builds them into Christian citizens.

In other centers.—Within the limits of this story, mention can only be made of the Church of our Savior, the only Protestant work among 10,000 Italians in Yonkers; of the Five Points Mission, located in the heart of the oldest Italian colony in the city; of Hadley Rescue Hall, in the historic Bowery, where, in addition to the rescue mission hall, are dormitory accommodations for about fifty men who have nowhere else to lay their heads, and facilities for feeding the hungry and clothing the destitute in all times of need; of the Japanese Church and institute commanding the respect of the Japanese population; and of the famous Mission in Chinatown, its first efforts more than a dozen years ago in a little hall—no success—street preaching—a convert now and then—some scoffs and jeers—a growing confidence—a greater harvest—a developing religious work.

In the greatest Negro city.—New York has the largest Negro population of any city in the world. In one section, Harlem, are to be found 150,000 Negroes, and there is church provision for only 20,000 of them. There are four Methodist Episcopal churches among the Negroes in New York, St. Mark's, Salem, Epworth, and Butler Memorial. Provision has been made in Harlem by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension for a new site for St. Mark's, a church with 2,500 members, worshipping further downtown, for a new church property for Salem, and similarly for Epworth. Butler Memorial has purchased a site for a new church. In Brooklyn, the John Wesley Methodist Episcopal Church (Negro) is meeting in what once was a Greek Catholic Church.

Methodism in Brooklyn.—Here, too, the church is brought face to face with great foreign-speaking colonies, transient neighborhoods and other situations which make the work of the church difficult.

Co-operation between the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension and the Brooklyn and Long Island Church Society have enabled the church to go forward in many places. Knickerbocker Avenue Church is an illustration. Founded more than twenty-five years ago, its first meeting place was in an old store. Around it were erected thousands of flats to which came many thousands of people to live. A Sunday school grew until it had 500 members, and no more could be jammed into the decrepit old quarters. Through help, a splendid new edifice was erected, adapted to community uses. More than 150 new members were added in a short time, and 140 new Sunday-school pupils were enrolled in one season.

Old John Street Church.—No story of all-New York Methodism, whether told in the terms of the past, the present, or the future, would be complete without reverential attention to that shrine of American Methodism, old John Street Church. Located far down-town, near the tip of Manhattan Island, and surrounded by the towering temples of business, this modest temple of worship stands on ground which has been hallowed by Methodist worship for a longer time than any other spot on the American continent.

A successful down-town church.—“Sold out to a factory” need no longer be the epitaph of the once prosperous, pretentious church which finds itself in the downtown section or in the foreign-speaking neighborhood of a great city. St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church of Jersey City, N. J., was one of the great churches of the denomination thirty years ago, with a membership of more than a thousand people. They disappeared, however, before the inrush of Italian, Russian, and Polish people. Now the church, with an adapted religious and social ministry, is on the upgrade and is training and nurturing these foreign-speaking people in a work organized in six racial groups.

"The Newsboys' Church."—This might be the title applied to the Market Street Methodist Episcopal Church, at Paterson, N. J., where 120 Jewish, Catholic and Protestant newsboys are daily gathered in for refreshment, a "sing", and then a religious service. A number of them have come in to the Sunday school. In this church, in the heart of a great industrial city, there are naturally many opportunities for Christian service. Helping a sick Portuguese lad, aiding a deaf Armenian girl, carrying on a Chinese Sunday school, all these are typical, picturesque activities of such a church. Ninety thousand people live within a radius of one mile of this church.

At work in Philadelphia.—The second city of the Middle Atlantic states, and the third of America, Philadelphia is Methodism's greatest metropolitan stronghold. It has 112 Methodist Episcopal churches, compared to 140 in Greater New York, and 96 in Chicago. Philadelphia's world reputation as a center of culture and religious expression often obscures the fact that the settling of hordes of immigrants in congested quarters and the housing of a great Negro population in run-down neighborhoods create keen social and religious problems. Philadelphia has its foreign-speaking colonies, its tenements, its industrial communities and its rapidly growing suburbs, all of which challenge the church to greater action.

Probationers' class, Kaighn Avenue Church, Camden, N. J.

The Fifth Street Temple.—What kind of a church would one expect to find eight blocks from Independence Hall, four blocks from Benjamin Franklin's grave, three blocks from old St. George's Methodist Episcopal Church, a shrine of American Methodism, and five blocks from Betsy Ross's house where the first American flag was made? The instinctive answer would be a great church in a patriotic American neighborhood. Yet what is the case? Hear the story of the Fifth Street Temple.

This neighborhood, rich in its traditions of American liberty and patriotism, today is distinctively polyglot, housing 100,000 people, Jewish, Polish, and Lithuanian predominating. The old church and its old program were about to pass out when the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension took hold. A splendid new community building was erected and in three years the neighborhood became a-throb with a new spiritual zeal and new life.

Today 2,500 people are often ministered to in a single week; there is a Sunday school of 500, of fourteen different nationalities, and an enrolment in classes and clubs of 600 different individuals; a woman's club of 100; a kindergarten of 75 to 100 children; a group of forty volunteer workers; a domestic science instructor, nurse, boys' worker, girls' worker, and miscellaneous other organizations and leaders. Religious work is emphasized, and Sunday services have a large hold on the neighborhood life.

One of the world's greatest churches.—A membership of over three thousand and church services in relays warrant the designation given to East Calvary Methodist Episcopal Church in Philadelphia. It is, in many ways, the greatest piece of work among Negroes in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

It is not unusual, when a capacity Sunday congregation has been dismissed, for another congregation just as large to be awaiting its turn for worship. In summer weather it is necessary to hold services in a huge tent out in the open. For weeks at a time during cold weather, from 200 to 500 men nightly have availed themselves of the opportunity to sleep in the church building and have a free warm meal. Clothing has been given to hundreds of suffering, shivering men. Among them, eight hundred conversions took place in a few months. Many white men also were helped. The cost of the relief work, about $70 a day, was borne by the Negro congregation for a long time, many of the members doing without meals and new clothing so that the more unfortunate might be cared for.

The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has made it possible for East Calvary church to purchase a fine new property on which a church and community center will be erected. The Board also is helping six other Negro churches in Philadelphia to solve the new problems growing out of the northern migration.

A dying church revived.—What home mission and church extension help can mean to a congregation is illustrated by the Kaighn Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, located in the congested section of Camden, N. J. For many years this church had been considered a forlorn hope. Often the Sunday morning congregation numbered only eight or ten persons. At least one-half the population is foreign-speaking. A modest bit of missionary aid was given and a capable leadership provided. After less than two years of such a program, the morning and evening congregations fill the church and 500 children attend the Monday night Happy Hour service. An Italian Sunday school also is conducted.

Methodism in Pittsburgh.—Forty Methodist Episcopal Churches make Pittsburgh vibrant with a great program of forward-looking Christianity. In addition to the great self-supporting centers, one might cite the new Dormont Methodist Episcopal Church, equipped for community service; or the Oakland Methodist Episcopal Church where new equipment and enlarged staff are making possible a successful work among students; or the excellent work at Butler Street, Friendship Park, Laketon Heights, the Polish Mission and the two Italian centers.

Brimstone Corner.—In 1788, Pittsburgh was listed as a regular Methodist Episcopal "appointment," and 1817 a church was built, now the Smithfield Street Church. Today it is in a very real sense, the center of the Methodist life of Pittsburgh. It not only ministers to a large American congregation but also carries on an important Italian work, and the building serves as the headquarters for the Methodist Episcopal Church Union. The Polish work is in the charge of a former miner who carried on religious work in his own home among his own people for fourteen years before he became a Christian minister. A unique city-wide feature is the employment of an Americanization worker and the enlistment of numerous volunteers to teach English. Already groups of Syrians, Slavs, Chinese, Spaniards, Hungarians, Greeks and Italians have been reached. Altogether, nearly fifty different institutions or separate activities are aided or supported by the Methodist Episcopal Church Union—certainly an energizing city-wide effort of evangelism and social service.

A developing Negro work.—In the "Pittsburgh District", comprising twenty-seven counties, there are at least 75,000 Negroes, one-third of whom have come north since the war. Aid from the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has made possible the organization of twenty congregations. However, they have only eight buildings for their use. In McKeesport, one of the largest industrial centers of the Pittsburgh region, the Board enabled the newly organized church to purchase a property formerly used as a Jewish synagogue. In two years it has come to complete self-support and makes a substantial benevolent offering.

A Pentecostal prayer meeting.—Imagine a prayer meeting where the Hungarian, Russian, Polish, Lithuanian, French, and German languages were all used in divine petition! Surely it would be as if Pentecost were being repeated. Yet such happens in the Methodist Episcopal center at North Braddock in the "Pittsburgh District", where a house-to-house canvass revealed 160 families of various racial groups without religious instruction. The one common language was German, so a German-speaking missionary was provided. A modern, serviceable church was built, and a membership of more than a hundred people was recruited. Already, young people from this church have gone into training for special religious work among foreign-speaking Americans.

The coke missions.—"Where the grimy toilers sweat at the smoking coke ovens, among the foothills of southwestern Pennsylvania," is located our unique "Coke Mission." It is more or less of a "moving van" ministry for migrating towns and peoples, but it is none the less efficient. In its area are scores upon scores of villages, like a great irregular checkerboard, with a network of trolley and railway lines for intercommunication. In the villages is a close commingling of many races and a variety of languages, cultures, social forces and religions.

The Coke Mission was launched a generation ago by the Pittsburgh conference. It began with one man who went about preaching and doing good. Today, among 500,000 people, half of whom are foreign-born and the children of foreign-born, the Methodist Episcopal Church has an organization with a superintendent, a score of chapels and community houses, about fifteen paid workers and two hundred volunteers, twenty-two preaching places, and thirty-six Sunday schools with an enrolment of 2,200 pupils, reporting evangelistic meetings whenever and wherever the way is opened, regular preaching in many places, street preaching by foreign workers, house-to-house sale of Bibles and other religious literature, language churches maintained, little Sunday schools in the villages, week-day schools of religious education, stereopticon and moving pictures used to teach religion, hospital and social ministries of all sorts, playground, girl scout and boy scout work, industrial classes, pageantry and music. In one report are listed twenty-three sewing classes, sixteen baseball teams, and seventeen daily vacation Bible schools. It is a great organization with a cosmopolitan grasp of religious needs and methods of work. It is aided by the department of rural work of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension.

Sheaves for the Kingdom.—The spiritual harvest of these labors is typified by the first foreign-language work in the coke district. It was begun among the Bohemians in 1898. The present membership is only fifty, only one more than at the end of the first year, yet in the intervening time 320 persons have been baptized, and the church has sent out from its membership for work among Bohemians, six ordained ministers of the Gospel, three local preachers, one deacon, three missionaries, and two trained nurses.

The McCrum Slavonic Training School at Uniontown, conducted by the Woman's Home Missionary Society, grew out of the interest and devoted efforts of the daughter of the pastor who served for twenty years as superintendent of the Coke Mission. The school today is sending out trained Christian Slavonic girls into the home mission fields of America and to Europe to do Christian work among their own people.

The analysis of a city.—Buffalo has one of the largest Polish populations among the cities of America, registering in excess of 100,000, while it also has a colony of 45,000 Italians. Others are Jews, 35,000; Negroes, 10,000; Hungarians, 5,000; native white Americans, 145,000; and 166,000 of different nationalities, such as German, Russian, Scandinavian, Greek and Syrian. One of the public schools has on its roll children of twenty-four nationalities. In a section of 32,798 people, half are native born, 10,000 are Polish, 3,000 Hungarian and the rest miscellaneous. In the church membership are 10,770 Roman Catholics and 4,520 Protestants, while 17,508 are not connected with any church. In the largest Italian colony of Buffalo, 18,000 are Catholic, 500 Protestant and 11,500 of no church connection. In the Polish section live 90,000 people, 80 per cent of whom are Polish. The rest are 5,000 Germans, 3,500 Jews, and smaller scattering groups. Church membership is 49,000 Catholic, 1,000 Protestant and 40,000 of no connection.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has hardly begun to grapple with this situation. There is a site for a church for Italians in Niagara Falls, but no church. There is an Italian pastor in Buffalo, but he has no plant in which to work. The Polish congregation is not equipped to deal with the spiritual challenge of 180,000 people. Negro Methodists are forced to worship in such places and at such times as other congregations have no use for their edifices.

University Church is a one-room building with a basement which is really a cellar located in a great developing center with a population now of 7,500, and with new houses being constructed on every side. At an expense of seven million dollars, Buffalo University is being rebuilt in this locality. There are at present 1,500 students. With proper equipment, University Church could have a membership within a year of from five to eight hundred people.

About two years ago, an educated and consecrated Polish minister was secured. Without any building, the work was begun with street preaching. A dwelling house has now been secured and altered so that the work will have a home. For a year, the pastor has spoken several times each week before the many Polish clubs of the city, and has a fixed place in the confidence and esteem of many of the most influential Poles of the city. Recently when the Vice-President of Poland was the guest of the city, it was our pastor who met him at the station and introduced him to the mayor, rode with them in the procession, and presented him to the throng who had gathered to listen to his address. He is paving the way for a citywide successful social and religious work among the Poles.

A "Friendly Center" has been opened by the Woman's Home Missionary Society, where seventy-five children are daily gathered and a splendid work is beginning.

A varied program.—The program carried on at these various centers involves far more than preaching and Sunday-school work. It includes week-day religious instruction, daily vacation Bible schools, English classes, fresh air work, Americanization classes, groups in the study of the Italian language, industrial courses, Boy Scout and Camp Fire Girls' activities, kindergartens, day nurseries, and a great variety of other social and religious programs.

None of these Italian churches has as yet reached the stage of self-support. In the congested centers of great cities the churches can be little more than pioneering and recruiting centers through which individuals are passed on in brief time to other churches. Such points may seem to have little to show by way of organization after years of effort, yet their work is of the very greatest importance.

Other city centers.—In at least forty other cities of New York state are to be found foreign-born population groups varying from 1,000 up to many thousands. Most of them are in the industrial centers where the social conditions and religious problems emphasized in the write-ups of the larger cities are present only differing in degree.

Eighty newspapers in thirteen different languages are delivered by the postman one morning of each week in the homes of the parish of the Clinton Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Binghamton, N. Y. Ten thousand of the 12,000 people there are Slovak, Lithuanian, Polish, Ukrainian, Syrian, Armenian, Italian, Jewish or other foreign-speaking. Ours is the only Protestant church in this community.

While these Polish and polyglot centers reach a variety of race groups in the Empire state, the most extended work is in more than twenty Italian colonies reaching from New York through the cities of the southern tier to Buffalo, and back through Rochester, Syracuse, Utica, and Schenectady to Troy and Albany. Beginning with nothing a few years ago, the first Italian Methodist Church in the United States was organized in 1880; the work has advanced until the number of Italians who are directly or indirectly under constant influence runs into the thousands.

Five in one.—Just an ordinary residence is rather cramped quarters for a settlement house, a mission, a recreation center, library, and community building, yet such is the housing for the Anthracite Slavonic Mission, conducted by the Woman's Home Missionary Society at East Berwick, Pennsylvania. Here live hundreds of Slovak, Hungarian, Syrian, Polish, and other foreign-speaking industrial workers and their families. The work started three years ago, is an exceedingly busy institution with sewing and cooking classes, clubs, and kindergarten, a fine Sunday school and week-day church school. One hundred boys, twelve to twenty years old, are in the clubs. Last year there was a daily vacation Bible school of 209 children.

In town and country.—In the midst of the lumber industry of the Adirondacks is the rural community of Newcombs, twenty-eight miles off the railroad. An influx of French-Canadians made the problem difficult. Finally the church gave up and sold its property. A new efficient leader bought back the old property, opened it, aligned every one of the fifty-four Protestant families of the township with the church, together with 200 lumberjacks. A parsonage and community house have since been erected.

A church can win over the dance halls and pool rooms for the attention and interest of the young people of a community. At Harrisville, New York, by right leadership and efficient methods, the church was reorganized, 100 new members added, the Sunday school trebled, the benevolences increased 400 per cent, two new Sunday schools opened at outlying points, a community hall erected and the parsonage rebuilt.

A twentieth-century church.—A five-point circuit at Dudley, Pennsylvania, with a population of 6,000, raised its support from $965 yearly to $2,800 by the reinvigoration made possible by right leadership. A new parsonage was built, two community houses erected and two pastors employed. Bigger Sunday schools and church services, week-day religious education, night school for Italians, recreation programs for old and young, are among the results.

Contagious success.—That success can be contagious is illustrated at Lander, Pennsylvania, which is becoming famous throughout western Pennsylvania because of its progress in developing a new community spirit. Within fifteen miles of Lander, five other churches already are taking steps to duplicate its venture. The milestones in the achievement were the coming of a new pastor with a vision, the enlistment of a community in a program of social and religious service, the erection of a community center, with gymnasium and club rooms, and a new interpretation of religion in terms of this life as well as the next. The spiritual result has been registered in enlarged attendance at public worship and in increased local support and a 1,000 per cent gain in benevolent giving.

Among the Indians.—Four mission stations are maintained by the Methodist Episcopal Church among the different Indian tribes of New York State.

Among 1,500 Mohawks on the St. Regis reservation, Hogsburg, N. Y., the Methodist Episcopal work is being directed from a building seventy-five years old, with warped flooring, an annually flooded basement and supporting timbers rotting away. The whole structure is dilapidated, yet the 250 Methodist Indians stand faithfully by. The leader is a native Mohawk, a university graduate and a former nationally known baseball player. There is a dire need for a new church building and community house to care for the needs of the reservation. Other points are Indian Falls, Onondaga, and Versailles.

Successful evangelism.—A field force of energetic and successful evangelists and spiritual upbuilders have labored from the congested tenements of New York to the regions far off the railroads.

In the Central Pennsylvania conference, a personal work campaign was organized and leaders trained. There were a Go-to-church Sunday, the rounding up of neglected church letters, decisions for Christ obtained, and the total membership of the conference raised to beyond the 100,000 mark.

A "soap-box" evangelism of a unique type is carried on in the congested, variegated Harlem section of New York. Here gather all colors, races, religious and political believers of every sort, in the melting pot of a religious forum.

Leadership training.—Several members of the Extension Field Force of the Board of Sunday Schools are at work in this section. To show the value of trained leadership, the following record of achievements in one conference under a field man's guidance is given: forty-five teacher training classes organized, with 250 enrolment; forty Bible classes formed, with 450 enrolment; thirty-nine schools graded or departmentalized; forty-two communities surveyed; forty-eight institutes or group meetings held, 20,000 persons attending; forty-three daily vacation Bible schools promoted, with 471 enrolled, and 235 per-

The Epworth League.—The Epworth League in the Middle Atlantic states is active in upbuilding and in missionary work.

A secretary is maintained in the League area office in New York. The Brooklyn North District supports a fresh-air home for children. The Northern District, Troy Conference, supports a native preacher in India; the Southern District, Troy Conference, started an Italian mission which has developed into a church. The Syracuse West District contributed $1,200 to support League work in South America. The Pittsburgh Conference supports a Methodist schools and colleges.—Of the various Methodist colleges in this section, Syracuse University, the largest, is a national institution. Others which may not be as large, and yet because of the standards they maintain and the training they give are just as vital are Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and Allegheny College, Meadville, Pennsylvania, and the eight secondary schools, all located on the map on page 269.

The ministry to students in non-Methodist institutions.—Through the activities of the Wesley Foundation Joint Committee and of individual churches, various efforts are being made to minister to Methodist students at Cornell, Princeton, Bucknell, Pennsylvania State College, the University of Pennsylvania, the University of Pittsburgh, and the Carnegie Institute of Technology.

In these institutions will be found Methodist student groups ranging from 400 to 1,200 in number. A social center unit has been added to our church at State College. A parsonage has been transformed into a community house and student headquarters in Pittsburgh. A fine property providing a parsonage and student headquarters has been purchased in Philadelphia, where a brilliantly successful program is in progress, and the Wesley Foundation is beginning to reach several institutions in addition to the University of Pennsylvania, the present center of our work.

Drew Theological Seminary.—At Madison, New Jersey, is located one of our greatest religious institutions for the training of ministers, missionaries and religious educators, Drew Theological Seminary. Its degrees are recognized everywhere and on its faculty are some of the outstanding scholars of Methodism.

Aside from the usual courses and departments of a theological seminary maintained in the College of Theology, Drew Seminary has a College of Missions, which prepares students for home and foreign missionary work. Such courses as Science and Practice of Missions, Foreign Missionary Languages, the City Church, The Town and Country Church, and Foreign-speaking Work are offered. The seminary enrolls women students, missionary candidates, missionaries on furlough, and gives special preparation for religious directors, church assistants and administrators, teachers, and leaders in denominational activities and philanthropic enterprises. It has sent out a steady stream of foreign missionaries for more than a generation. It trains men also for home missions, instructing in rural leadership, city evangelization, and bi-lingual religious work.

Goodwill Industries.—Goodwill Industries are in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Jersey City, and Brooklyn.

Congregation of University church,
Syracuse, New York

In Buffalo, the old Grace Methodist Episcopal Church and adjoining property serve as the headquarters for the Goodwill Industries. The Children's Settlement through play and useful activity is up-building the moral and religious life of the children of the surrounding neighborhood.

In Jersey City, the Goodwill Industries operate five buildings, and during the past year have doubled their business and have employed seventy-five opportunity workers. A Goodwill Community Center is conducted and two churches are closely related. It has a parish of 65,000 people, of whom ninety per cent are foreign born. Work is being done among twenty-eight nationalities. There are a day nursery, library, clubs, an Italian Department, Slavic Department, religious services in Italian, English, and Russian, and employment department—altogether a broad social and religious program deeply affecting the whole section of the city. From this center of Christian service have gone a Polish young man to become a minister of his own people, an Italian to become a Young Men's Christian Association secretary, a Lithuanian girl for social-service work, and an American girl, one of the workers at the center, to become a deaconess.

In Philadelphia, the Methodist students at University of Pennsylvania

Goodwill Industries are conducted in connection with Fifth Street Temple, and many of its employees are workers in its Sunday school. Within a radius of three blocks live twenty-three nationalities.

In Pittsburgh, the Goodwill Industries are in the famous "Strip", a low-lying stretch of the city in which foreign-speaking people, Negro and white Americans are huddled together in housing conditions which are lamentably inadequate and where the air is always heavy with dust and smoke from the steel mills.

Bible distribution.—A tremendous field for distribution of the Scriptures is found in the Middle Atlantic states. Most of the foreign-speaking peoples who live in the city and rural industrial centers are from non-Bible-using lands, therefore, the opportunity is so much the greater. Scriptures are now available in thirty-eight of the languages spoken in these states, in two-language form, that is, with the English and foreign-language versions in parallel columns.

LOOKING FORWARD

A century's generous giving of money and men to the mission fields of the world, has won for the Middle Atlantic states the right to call upon the great Methodist Episcopal Church at large for the life and means to evangelize the strange, new multitudes within their borders. In short, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, in spite of their great and numerous churches and the splendid ministry to be found here and there in city, town, and country, present a mission field of vast extent and tremendous need.

Aid is needed to—Establish a church and community center in a woefully unchurched city section of 25,000 Negroes.

Erect an adequate church building in an industrial residential neighborhood where the Sunday school is so crowded one class has to meet in the coal bin.

Build an adequate church and community building in a new, modest, suburban district where the present country church building has seventy little children crowded into an ante-room not able to accommodate more than twenty decently.

Provide ample quarters for a Polish work growing out of street preaching in a large Polish section of a great city.

Enable the church to develop work in sixty-four industrial towns in one part of a state which have no religious ministry whatever.

Complete a building project, delayed by the war, in an industrial community of 10,000 people.

Erect a church building in community of 2,000 people where the Methodist Episcopal congregation—the only one in the town—is worshipping in a small school room.

Enter large colonies of German-speaking Russians where little spiritual ministry is now provided.

Expand the missionary work to meet needs of thirty lumber camps, all of them Methodist responsibility.

Support pastors and missionaries in anthracite mining towns, now unchurched.

Lift debt on new church caught by inflated prices during erection and now threatened with foreclosure.

Maintain work in numerous weak rural centers.

Replace building erected in 1860 and now condemned.

Re-establish work in isolated rural communities abandoned during the war.

Provide church facilities—none whatever now—in irrigation project with employees and families totaling 2,000 people.

Relocate building in gardening and poultry-farming community of 2,000.

Complete church building stopped by rising costs. Congregation practically bankrupt.

Renovate Bohemian Methodist Episcopal church building, part of which must be rented out as living quarters to meet church expenses.

Provide a Sunday-school building for a working-class community where 900 pupils attempt to meet in a little old building.

Make possible the erection of fifteen church buildings for as many Negro congregations in one district.

Evangelize 330,000 Italians of New York—acknowledged to be Methodism's fair share of the opportunity.

Open new missions, churches and community centers in the great metropolitan centers where literally hundreds of thousands of foreign and native born people, among whom the doctrines of atheism and anarchy run riot, are untouched by the ministry of any church whatsoever.

Expand the work of educational and philanthropic institutions, and enable a more adequate and better-trained leadership to be provided for the missionary program of the church.

A system of week-day religious instruction involves educational methods, staff, curriculum, and supervision on the same plane as children find in the public school.

HENRY S. COPE

EAST NORTH CENTRAL STATES

A new pilgrimage.—Westward the course of another empire takes its way—the empire of industry. It began its march along the Atlantic Coast and is steadily journeying toward the Pacific. It has made its conquest of New England, has established its sure domain in the Middle Atlantic group, has left the Alleghenies behind, and today is rapidly advancing toward the sovereignty of the East North Central states. The transition, in which the far-famed agriculture of these states hands over its preeminence to industrialism is one of profound import.

The extent of industry.—Michigan is the world center for the manufacture of automobiles, about two-thirds of the 2,000,000 cars produced annually being made there. It also has extensive iron ore, copper and coal mines, and a big lumber production. Ohio has more than 16,000 manufacturing establishments, employing more than 1,000,000 persons. The iron and steel ore and reduction and machinery industries lead all others. Oil production is heavy and automobile manufacture extensive. Indiana's greatest industrial center is in the Calumet region, adjacent to Lake Michigan. With Gary as the center, vast steel mills make it one of the world's important manufacturing regions.

Illinois, the third state in the union in population, is one of the nation's industrial centers, heading up in Chicago and nearby cities. It has extensive coal mines, standing third in bituminous production. Wisconsin, in addition to large manufacturing interests, mines, dairies and fisheries, affords the largest lumber cut in the Great Lakes region.

The agricultural situation.—Agriculturally, the East North Central states are among the nation's leaders. The fact that manufacturing has become the leading occupation does not mean agricultural decline. Rather is it that industry has gone ahead much faster. Agriculture is still in a state of development and is making steady, although relatively slow progress. The range of products is very extensive, from fruits and berries of many kinds to the major grain crops.

Population tendencies.—Today the East North Central division has one-fifth the population of the United States, 21,475,543, running an exceedingly close race with the Middle Atlantic states. The latter increased 15.2 per cent in population between 1910 and 1920, while the former added 17.7 per cent.

The trend to the cities over a period of thirty years, 1890-1920, is shown in the changing percentages of urban and rural population. In 1890 62.2 per cent of the people were classified as rural and only 37.8 per cent as urban. Today there is practically a reversal of the situation, the 1920 census showing 60.8 per cent of the people living in the cities and only 39.2 per cent living in the villages and open country. There is a Negro population of 514,554, or an increase of 71 per cent in the last decade. Illiteracy has been kept at a low rate, registering only 2.9 per cent for the whole area.

The American-born element is still dominant in this region, although hundreds of thousands of foreign-speaking immigrants have congregated in the industrial and mining districts.

The heart of Methodism.—In the early days when the pioneers were hewing clearings out of the vast forests and settlements were being planted here and there, the circuit-rider toiled with the souls of men in the wilderness. The fruits of his labor and of those zealous disciples who followed him have been seen in the virile Methodist Episcopal churches which have dotted the cities, villages and countryside of the Great Lakes region for three-quarters of a century. Here, among the major geographical sections of America, Methodism has come to its fullest flower. Those little log churches in the wilderness, supported by the missionary zeal of colonial Methodism, have grown into splendid temples of worship, able not only to support themselves but to give abundantly of life and means for missionary work at home and abroad.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL ACHIEVEMENTS

A statistical statement.—The total membership is 1,225,615, and the number of churches is 7,351. The Sunday-school enrolment is 1,357,383, and the average attendance is 684,671. The Epworth League has a membership of 130,946, and the Junior Epworth League of 42,017. The net valuation of churches and parsonages is $92,400,923. The total benevolences for 1922 were $6,506,014, while the total paid for all purposes was $25,933,942, a per capita payment of $21.16.

Included in these totals are 236 German Methodist Episcopal churches with 25,504 members; 113 Scandinavian churches with 8,877 members, and 91 Negro churches, 101 pastoral charges, many of the congregations not having church buildings, with 15,619 members.

Methodism has pushed her educational and philanthropic work here as far or farther than in any other section of the United States. Again the figures can but indicate their magnitude or influence: twenty-three colleges, universities, and secondary and professional training schools; student work at fifteen non-Methodist educational institutions: eighty-eight summer schools and institutes; and forty-four hospitals, old people's homes, orphanages, and other philanthropic institutions.

THE CHALLENGE OF THE FIELD

Middle-West cities.—Twelve of America's fifty largest cities are located in the East North Central states. In their order of size they are Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Milwaukee, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, Toledo, Columbus, Akron, Dayton, Grand Rapids, and Youngstown. Here also are some of the most rapidly growing cities of the country such as Detroit which increased 527,912, or 113 per cent in population between 1910 and 1920; Akron, 201 per cent; Gary, 229 per cent; Cicero, 209 per cent; and Kenosha, 84 per cent.

Chicago's "New Americans."—Chicago, the second city of America and the fourth of the world, the world's greatest railway center and one of its greatest industrial centers, naturally presents the biggest foreign-speaking problem in the area. The foreign-born population is placed at 805,482. The total foreign-speaking element, including the children of foreign-born and mixed parentage, approaches the 2,000,000 mark.

Detroit rates its 1,000,000 population as twenty per cent native; forty per cent foreign born; thirty-five per cent of foreign parentage, and five per cent Negro.

Cleveland, with approximately 800,000 people, has a foreign population, including foreign-born, and of foreign parentage, of about sixty-five per cent.

The rural problem.—While the cities of the East North Central states gained 7,952,091 between 1890 and 1920, the rural population advanced only 45,147.

Recitation Hall, Lawrence College, Appleton, Wisconsin

WORLD SERVICE

Between 1900 and 1920 there was an actual decrease of 339,335 persons. This steady depopulation of the countryside is reported to be continuing, although authorities predict a back-to-the-farm movement of people which will at least check the decline. Improved machinery and better transportation permit agricultural development to go forward while the actual number of farmers may become fewer.

The movement of country people to the cities has had a serious effect upon the rural church. Hundreds of churches in the open country through these states have closed their doors and abandoned their buildings or turned them into haysheds. Different surveys show an alarming condition of dead and dying churches. Volumes have been written revealing the conditions and the causes. It is a situation which is not peculiar alone to the East North Central states, but to nearly all the established farming regions of the United States, especially where industrial cities are frequent.

Tenancy and the church.—Tenancy is steadily increasing and along with it is a growing transiency which always embarrasses constructive church effort. Many a rural church has built up a constituency only to find it vanish in a year. In one Illinois country church, the district superintendent has tried three times to bring the charge to self-support, but each time removal of tenants has made necessary the building up of a new constituency. Thus through tenancy, churches become a permanent missionary challenge to the church.

Methodist Episcopal church,
Redford, Michigan

A fundamental problem.—Competition among country churches, absentee pastors, lack of right leadership, lack of community church equipment and programs, and the social attractions of villages and towns made available to country people by automobiles and good roads, lead many to believe that this rural problem is the most serious of all for the church because it is the most fundamental.

An Ohio survey.—In fifty counties there are 637 abandoned churches. There are 137 Methodist Episcopal, seventy-one United Brethren, fifty-two Baptist, thirty-six Disciples of Christ, thirty-two Presbyterian, and twenty-six Lutheran—which would indicate that the abandoned church is not peculiar to any denomination. Rather is it due to changed economic and social conditions. The introduction of the automobile, which has happened almost entirely within the last ten years, has revolutionized rural life.

One community surveyed had 775 people and nine churches, seven of which had been abandoned and the other two were inactive. Nine-tenths of the community was totally untouched. One strong church would have served the entire group. In another county were two communities: one with 1,300 people had three resident pastors, and the other adjoining it, with 4,000 people, had no resident pastor at all.

In this week-day religious education class,
Gary, Indiana, thirty-eight nationalities are represented

Our church in Tovey, Illinois, built on the site once occupied by a saloon.—The women of the church scraped the 40,000 bricks

It was reported that Ohio had nearly 400 communities, some of them with over 2,000 people, without a resident pastor in any of them.

Other rural types.—The vast copper, coal, and iron ore mining regions contain hundreds of towns and villages peopled by many nationalities whose social and religious needs are acute.

In central and southern Illinois, where Peter Cartwright preached, mine shafts dot the country over. Germans, Italians, Englishmen, Scotchmen, Poles, Lithuanians, Scandinavians, French, Roumanians, Slavs of all kinds, and Mexicans work in the corn fields, mines, smelter works, glass factories, mining and railway supply foundries.

At various points along the Mississippi, where the land was formerly under water or in swamps, drainage districts have been organized and thousands of acres protected. Some of the districts are operated by poor tenants with capital invested by absentee landlords and corporations.

In Michigan and Wisconsin, especially, will be found logged off lands now being opened up to settlement. New people are pouring in, to face much the condition of the pioneers. Homes must be built, land further cleared, schools and churches started. Much of it is sparsely settled. The people are isolated but are spiritually hungry.

In the same northern regions are extensive forests in which thousands of lumberjacks are toiling. Of the several nationalities among them, the Finns predominate.

THE MISSIONARY SERVICE OF THE CHURCH

Achievements which point the way.—It is not possible here to list all the individual achievements of the missionary program of the church, or even to give adequate mention to all its phases. If, however, a few illustrations succeed in suggesting both the vastness and the variety of our home mission work in these states and in inspiring our church to still greater accomplishments for the Kingdom, then the purpose will have been served.

Methodism in Chicago.—In the forefront of the denominations in Chicago in making adjustment and expansion for city work, is the Methodist Episcopal. A new day is at hand for Chicago Methodism, a day of unparalleled achievement.

A Thoburn victory.—In a neighborhood of thousands of modest homes of working people is Thoburn Methodist Episcopal Church, an outstanding witness of city church possibilities. Formerly a struggling mission chapel, it embarked on a program to reach its community. Co-operation between an energetic people, a far-visioned pastor and the statesmanlike Board of Home Missions and Church Extension and the City Missionary Society, made possible a splendid $125,000 church and community building. Today the membership is around 1,000, and the Sunday school has nearly as many enrolled. The church is a haven for old and young. It swarms with young people. The Sunday evening audience packs the auditorium and is the largest regular evening church congregation in the city.

"Back of the Stock Yards."—In the heart of the greatest foreign-speaking colony of Chicago's famous stock-yards district is located Community Methodist Episcopal Church. Twenty nationalities are represented in the Sunday school and a dozen in the church membership. Polish, Bohemian, and Lithuanian are the chief types being served. Thirty-two athletic clubs, many of them formerly exploited by ward politicians, are now directed in their activities by a Board of Control, led by the pastor. In every activity for the betterment of the 300,000 people living in the stock yards territory, Community Church is always a prominent factor, itself serving a population of 75,000.

In "Little Italy."—In the greatest Italian section of Chicago, famous for its black-hand murders and known for long as the "Bloody Nineteenth" ward is to be found the First Italian Methodist Episcopal Church. In three schools in its parish, ninety-five per cent of the 7,100 school children are Italian. An excellent work in evangelism and modern religious education is carried on by the bi-lingual pastor and his assistants. Recently a class of twenty-five probationers was received.

The South Side Negroes.—Within four years, the Negro Methodist Episcopal churches in Chicago have increased from four to fifteen. Through missionary aid some of these congregations have been housed in good but old-style buildings formerly occupied by white congregations. Five years ago the South Park Methodist Episcopal congregation was housed in a small store room which could be spanned by three men touching hands. The membership has grown from 200 to 3,000 and now worships in a large church formerly used by white people.

It is estimated that 300 or more graduates of the institutions of the Board of Education for Negroes reside in Chicago. Of these, nearly one hundred are physicians, pharmacists, and dentists, who are graduates of Meharry Medical College, one is a Bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal church, two are ministers, graduates of Gammon Theological Seminary, one the Assistant Corporation Counsel of Chicago, another Assistant State's Attorney, others are government and post office clerks, teachers, tradesmen, stenographers, business men, nurses, housewives and dressmakers.

Varied missionary achievements.—Through co-operation with the City Missionary Society and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, steady progress is being made in many fields of Chicago. In the Lincoln Street church, which fourteen years ago had a thousand children of native American stock in its Sunday school, now will be found eleven distinctly religious services and thirty-nine other activities each week, ministering to Slovenian, Lithuanian, Bohemian, and German people. The community is ninety per cent foreign, and houses 75,000 people to the square mile, thus presenting an acute Americanization problem.

In the great steel mill section running for thirty miles along the lake front from Chicago south and east, the Chicago-Calumet Industrial Federation is developing a parish program of religious and social service. A Russian work is being developed at Pullman and several nationalities are ministered to at Hegewisch. Thirty-five thousand men are employed in the mammoth steel mills of South Chicago. Here men of the community got together with the pastor and erected a temporary community center while waiting for the erection of the planned-for church and parish building. At Chicago Heights, a city of 30,000 people of a score of nationalities, the new community church is open day and night, seven days a week, and by reaching thousands monthly is building up the life of the neighborhood. In the industrial regions north of Chicago, primarily in the Waukegan region, similar activities are reaching the twenty-five nationalities of the parish.

The Chicago Temple.—The crowning glory of Chicago Methodism is in its new majestic Chicago Temple. The only remaining church property in the city's famous "loop," where traffic ebbs and flows ceaselessly, it is becoming the headquarters of the city's organized religious life. Numerous other denominations are centering their offices there. On the main floor is an imposing auditorium which will minister week day and Sunday to the city-wide membership and to the thousands of transients who are in Chicago's downtown district daily. The Chicago Temple will in time doubtless attain the prestige and world-fame of the City Temple of London.

A steady progress.—Concerning the work in and around Chicago, Bishop Thomas Nicholson has said: "In Chicago at least twenty-five new churches have either recently been completed, are now in process of erection or are scheduled for the current year. The increase of membership has been gratifying. The new program of the church wherever tried stands the test. Parish and community houses, with church training night, are changing a meager prayer meeting attendance into a church night with from 150 to 500 people present."

In the "Motor City."—In 1855, Methodism had five churches and chapels, membership of 400, in Detroit. In 1910 there were twenty English-speaking churches, with a membership of a little more than 8,000. Today there are forty English-speaking, one Finnish, one Italian, one Polish and three German-speaking Methodist churches in the city. Recent progress in city missions can be attributed largely to a thorough survey showing the city's needs and the formation by the Methodist Union of Greater Detroit, of a "city parish" and an enlarged missionary program. Today the staff of the "city parish" comprises foreign-language pastors, deaconesses, social service workers, clinic nurses, visiting nurses, day nursery matrons, goodwill industry workers, foreign-language teachers, and vacation Bible school workers.

City mission victories.—In Detroit are numerous new communities such as Ferndale, where 4,000 young married people are building small homes and where within six weeks a Sunday school of 200 and a church of 200 members were organized starting in a lodge hall.

The Palmer Memorial Church has been made an Italian center where the outstanding Italian Protestant work of the city is carried on. Detroit Methodism believes that this will produce one of the greatest Italian churches in the country if the necessary resources are at hand.

In a Polish settlement of 40,000 people is St. Peter's—the first Polish Methodist Church in Detroit. The former National Catholic congregation which worshipped in the building, wishing to become Protestant, asked to be received into the Methodist Episcopal Church. A home mission appropriation enabled the congregation to pay off the debt and the church and school buildings are now administered under Methodist auspices. The parochial school has been turned into a public school with the Board of Education supplying the teachers. In other centers the needs of Armenians and Syrians are being met.

Harper Church center was established and built up by a deaconess in a single year. A medical clinic was founded, the board of health furnishing two physicians and two nurses. It is related to Harper Church, whose membership is 152 and Sunday-school enrolment 350. Centenary Church, an old residential type is now ministering almost altogether to "new Americans," including Polish, Hungarian, Lithuanian, Italian, and Russian people, all of whom can be found in the religious services. The Sunday-school enrolment is 364. Clubs, gardening, sewing classes, basketry, manual training, vacation school, and dispensary are maintained. There are also a day nursery, a playground, and Goodwill Industries in connection.

New life for an old community.—The Goodwill Church, Settlement, and Industries of Cincinnati, Ohio, are in a congested tenement house district near railroad terminals, grain elevators, the haymarket, and many factories. The neighborhood was once the wealthy residential section of Cincinnati, with a fine residential Methodist church. With the shifting of population, there is now poverty, vice, squalor, and congestion everywhere, cramped quarters, dark rooms badly ventilated, no sanitary conveniences, and no yards for the children to play in. A new program was begun, with a trained leadership, and the work rapidly expanded. Equipment has been added and the present value of the property is $70,000, with an annual budget of nearly $50,000, carrying on the work of the Industries, the Children's Settlement and the Church. The day begins with the day nursery and kindergarten. There are sewing and cooking schools, manual training clubs, girl scouts and boy scouts and a mothers' club. Through the gymnasium, moving pictures and playground, the recreational life of the boys and girls is ministered to.

The Calumet region.—In the famous Calumet region of northwestern Indiana, Gary, Hammond, Indiana Harbor, East Chicago, and Whiting, comprise one of the greatest steel mill sections of the world. Many thousands of foreign-born are employed and their social and religious needs are acute. Social conditions vary greatly. Model housing development exists alongside of congestion and squalor. Some of the companies are progressive as to working conditions and hours. Others still cling to the twelve-hour day, seven-day week labor policy.

In other cities.—In Milwaukee, Summerfield and Grand Avenue Methodist Episcopal Churches are doing epochal downtown work. Asbury Church is in a polyglot section and St. Peter's is the only Polish Methodist mission in the city. In Dayton, Ohio, a number of churches are doing a community work. Neighborhood reformation has been wrought by the work of the West Side Community House, Cleveland, where 2,558 different boys and girls were enrolled and attended classes during a recent eight-months' period. The institution has seventeen boys' and six girls' basketball teams. A state authority says that crime has decreased very noticeably in that section of Cleveland since the Community House has been operating.

At Springfield, Illinois, is Wesley Church, with a fine community building, partially erected out of paving brick given to the congregation. On dedication day over one hundred charter members were received. At Flint, Michigan, is Trinity Church, a temporary structure built during war times. It now has a Sunday school of 250. Valley Avenue Church at Grand Rapids, and Calvary Church, Terre Haute, both German, are rapidly developing with modern programs. The Italian Methodist Church at Madison, Wisconsin, specializes in community work and citizenship activities. The Methodist Settlement in Indianapolis, in a section inhabited by factory and railroad people, carries on a community ministry.

Printing class in the Industrial School, Lincoln Street Community Church, Chicago

An East St. Louis church was housed at first in a wooden tabernacle. There were sixty-eight charter members and eighty-seven in the Sunday school, increasing in less than a year to 180 and 325 respectively. A week-day school of religious education for Negroes in which 150 pupils are enrolled is maintained by Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church and Stewart House in Gary. A community nurse visits the sick, a modified Goodwill Industries is maintained, and social, recreational, and religious activities are carried on.

A rural parish demonstration.—An outstanding experiment in the "rural parish" idea is in Lake and McHenry counties, Illinois, in the Rock River Conference, with nine charges and sixteen churches in the open country.

A district rural society was formed and a director of rural work with special training was appointed for these charges. The department of rural work of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension co-operated with the department of religious education of Northwestern University and with Garrett Biblical Institute in putting on a demonstration program, making this field a laboratory for the training of leaders. Directors of religious education, community organization and social life were secured. They organized each of these communities for an extended social, educational and worship program.

Two Michigan parishes.—Dead churches brought back to life, scores of new members added, buildings renovated, gifts increased, and community spirit developed have resulted in the working out of the parish plan in southern Michigan.

The church at Charlotte, Michigan, was chosen as the center of one parish. Center Eaton is one group of three rural churches on Charlotte parish and Gresham is another. Before the adoption of the parish plan, there were six decaying or dead country churches, paying a salary of $1,500 and parsonage. Today all six are live and active country churches, supporting three ministers and increasing the local salaries $2,825 per year.

Eaton Rapids parish, with Eaton Rapids as the center, is composed of the Griffith group and Onondaga group of churches, the rural appointments of Charlesworth, Robbins, and Winfield. Formerly there were six churches, two in the open country and inadequately served, and four were closed. Where $1,300 was paid to one minister before, now he is given $3,000, an assistant is paid $1,600 and a student pastor $600. On Easter, 1923, these churches received into membership 176 persons.

In town and country.—Plainfield, Illinois, Methodist Episcopal Church has a community center which has the mayor and president of the school board as members of the board of control. The strong social and religious spirit developed is helping to keep the young men and women in the community, instead of drifting off to the city.

At Coalton, Illinois, a Sunday school which has met successively in a dance hall, an abandoned saloon, out in the open air and finally in the jail, is to be housed in an adequate building, with the foreign-speaking residents paying for the lot, the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension helping on the building, carpenters donating service and the farmers furnishing sand and gravel. A girls' club is taught sewing, cooking, fancy work, and there is a children's class in sewing and music.

In Brown County, Indiana, is a demonstration of what effective leadership will do. For years there had been no ordained minister living in the county. An investigation revealed nine scattered villages or communities which needed religious services. Seven of them became the new pastor's circuit. Before he had settled in his new home, the young people began to ask to borrow his books. He saw the need of a public library and broadcasted an appeal for books. More than 1,600 were donated. Through the pastor's efforts a town library was established, later a county library with 10,000 volumes. Farming was on the decline, so the pastor carried on a campaign which secured a county agricultural agent. He advocated fruit raising and started a nursery. He urged the merit of dairying upon the farmers. A community which had paid practically nothing one year to benevolences paid more than $5,000 the next year. The Sunday-school enrolment became 300 and the church membership 321. An Epworth League with thirty-three members was organized and two Junior Leagues of eighteen members each.

In Lewis, Wisconsin, located in the cut-over lands is the People's Church, the center not only of the village life but of the community many miles around. Under the leadership of a far-visioned pastor, the sparsely settled sections grouped themselves and carried on programs of recreation and public worship which ran through an entire winter. In Marshfield, Wisconsin, a town of 8,000 people, Protestantism exerted but little influence. With missionary aid, a $35,000 church was erected and is now the center of the town's activities.

The foreign language conferences.—The East North Central states form one of the strongholds of the German and Scandinavian conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a number of them developing an excellent community and home mission work. Flourishing churches are maintained in the rural Swiss colonies of Michigan and Ohio, and a large section of Illinois and Wisconsin, heavily populated by German people.

A church romance.—A thrilling interest attaches to the foreign language churches. Out of the efforts of a German-speaking missionary, there has come the organization of a Russian mission in South Akron, which started in the basement of a dilapidated dwelling occupied by several families. The first Sunday school class was actually held in a fruit cellar with two pupils. Yet this has grown to a school with an average attendance of about 150 Russian, Austrian and Hungarian children. The 1922 probationers' class of twenty-two contained nine children from the mission, who speak five languages.

These people joined the German Methodist Episcopal church.

Opportunity investments.—The recent influx of Norwegians, Swedes, and Danes, as well as the shifting of population, has opened up new opportunities for greatly extending our Scandinavian work.

The pastor at Superior, Wisconsin, made a careful canvass of some new territory and discovered a most inviting mission field. The old, ramshackle building was torn down, the trustees themselves dismantling the old chapel and using the suitable material for the new structure. The excavating was mostly done by members of the church. The old material was carted by the trustees to the new site, and much of the carpentering was done by them. The new church was built at a cost of $20,000 with some help from the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension.

Living evangelism.—From hospitals to mining camps and from large cities to wayside villages the workers aided by the department of evangelism of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension go, preaching the Gospel, reviving hopeless and helpless churches, comforting the sick and carrying on an itinerant ministry much as the Savior himself did. The results are immeasurable.

The labors of one evangelist, who combined debt-paying and soul-winning campaigns in a number of churches, resulted in two years in more than 1,000 new members, $242,300 raised to cancel heavy debts, thirty young people dedicating their lives to Christian work, 400 conversions, hundreds of tithing pledges and innumerable reconsecrations to the Christian life. Several churches which were about to be closed and sold at sheriff's sale were saved; their congregations were encouraged; church debts were paid or provided for; and seven-day-week programs were mapped out and launched.

Goodwill Industries.—Five Goodwill Industries are located in the East North Central states, at Cincinnati and Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago and Milwaukee.

In Cleveland, the old Acme hall, famous as a radical socialists' headquarters, houses the Goodwill Industries. Chapel services are conducted every morning in the old bar-room. A Goodwill forum is conducted once a month which has had a widespread civic influence. Free moving pictures are provided for the children and parents of the district, whose population is mostly Italian, Slovak, Syrian and Russian. Out of a Sunday afternoon Sunny Hour has come a fine Sunday school, "racially 100 per cent foreign, but loyally 100 per cent American."

A recent report of the Milwaukee Goodwill Industries showed a roll of 26,239 contributors of waste material, sales during the year through the Goodwill stores of $34,881, of which $22,625 was paid in wages to the aged, needy and handicapped.

During the year work was given to 791 people representing twenty-one nationalities and fourteen creeds. The total attendance at chapel services for the year was 14,506.

A real "Youth Movement."—"Young people's work for young people", carried on by the Epworth League is characterized by a strong charitable and missionary spirit. In Ohio, one district supports a community house in a foreign section of a city; another district supports a fresh-air camp; and still another contributes largely for the Christian education of Moslem boys. In Indiana, one district makes large donations to a hospital, and pays the salary of an Epworth League secretary for South America; another supports a missionary in China; and another maintains Americanization work among Italian children.

In Illinois, one district partially supports a baby fold, and helps in the support of a missionary in Korea; another contributes to the support of an Epworth League secretary in Europe. The Epworth League in Michigan is financing the Twenty-four-Hour-Day plan of League work in China, and also leads in the number of mission study classes, having reported for 1922 a total of 974 classes. In Wisconsin the League is especially active in the support of hospital work.

Methodist colleges.—Space will not permit an appreciation of each one of the colleges, universities, secondary schools and training schools with which the East North Central states are so richly endowed. A chapter on each one would not suffice for its achievements and world-wide influence. The far vision of our great church enables it to understand their importance and to plan for the co-operation which will enable each one to advance to the position the times demand in the need for Christian leadership in world affairs.

Ohio Wesleyan University is one of the notable schools of Methodism. It has provided thirty college and university presidents to various institutions; it has furnished the Methodists with eight bishops, Luccock, McCabe, Anderson, Foss, Hughes, McConnell, McDowell and Thirkield. Three of its presidents, Thompson, Bashford and Welch, have been elevated to the episcopacy.

In a similar way DePauw University, Lawrence, Mt. Union, Albion and Illinois Wesleyan of splendid tradition and great promise are serving the cause of education and religion in their respective sections. At Jacksonville, the Illinois Woman's College is Methodism's only distinctly woman's educational institution west of the Allegheny Mountains. The board of trustees, the president and the faculty hope to make this college one of the greatest in America. The other Methodist Episcopal educational institutions in these states, listed under the map on page 295, are rendering equally significant service.

A leadership training center.—Methodism has concentrated at a strategic point forces and facilities for leadership training which are without superior in the denomination. Chicago, with its environs, located within a night's railroad journey of 40,000,000 people is that point. In Evanston and Chicago are located Northwestern University and its various graduate schools, equipping men and women for educational, ministerial and other professional leadership; Garrett Biblical Institute, a great training center for ministers, missionaries, and religious educational directors; the Norwegian-Danish Theological Seminary and the Swedish Theological Seminary, both training leaders for churches of the foreign language conferences and the Chicago Training School, preparing both men and women, lay and clerical for church and missionary work.

Garrett Biblical Institute.—The main emphasis of Garrett Biblical Institute is in the Graduate School of Theology. It makes provision for the ministerial training of college graduates in the Graduate School of Theology who in certain departments are permitted, with the approval of the Board of Graduate Studies of Northwestern University, to pursue selected courses in the School of Theology leading to advanced graduate degrees in specialized fields.

A graduate school of religion.—The closest correlation of activities and courses exists between Garrett Biblical Institute and Northwestern University. That relationship expresses itself chiefly through the Graduate School of the University, which has courses arranged for ministerial students who are candidates for advanced degrees and for a large group of graduates who are preparing for positions of religious and social leadership other than the ministry.

The Chicago Training School.—Training for Christian work in varied fields is the purpose of the Chicago Training School, with university standards for college graduates; an undergraduate school with college standards for high school and normal school graduates; a preparatory school with high school standards for those desiring to prepare themselves for leadership in the local church. Since its organization in 1885, the Chicago Training School has sent out more than 5,000 students.

These students have founded forty institutions of American Methodism, such as hospitals, training schools, deaconess homes, baby folds, orphanages and rest homes. From the school have gone out 408 foreign missionaries, 1,000 deaconesses, 250 social workers, one hundred directors of religious education and 2,500 home-makers and lay workers who give part time service.

Rural leadership training.—In the East North Central states, rural leadership departments are maintained at Albion College, University of Illinois, Ohio Wesleyan University, Mount Union College, McKendree College, Garrett Biblical Institute and the University of Wisconsin.

At the University of Wisconsin, in connection with the Wesley Foundation, courses of study, designed to develop the right understanding of an approach to the rural field, are provided. The rural parish in all its phases, historical, social, economic and religious, is discussed. Rural life, religious education and methods of rural church work are given consideration. The director of rural leadership advises with the student pastors in order to increase the effectiveness of their service, and at the same time gives them laboratory training. He also co-operates with superintendents and pastors in putting on rural training institutes and with the rural

The Wesley Foundation.—The Wesley Foundation is the most notable advance in Christian education in the last quarter century. In addition to the steady growth and increasing usefulness of our denominational schools, the Church now proposes to bring guidance and religious nurture to our youth in state and independent educational institutions. The early inauguration of this work at the University of Illinois with its continued development has been one of the outstanding achievements of the church in recent years.

The objectives of a Wesley Foundation, as stated by the pioneer in this movement are "to provide churches for college and university students that will offer a shrine for worship; a school for religious education; a home away from home; a laboratory for training lay leaders in church activities; and a recruiting station for the ministry, for missionary work at home and abroad, and for other specialized Kingdom tasks."

Other student centers.—At Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, the needs of the unusually large proportion of Methodist students are being met by near-by churches, especially King Avenue and Indianola. At Ann Arbor, Michigan, a fine building adjoining our Methodist church has been remodeled and equipped for a student center. Our church here has one of the largest volunteer student congregations in Methodism. On the West Side of the city of Chicago, in a most difficult field in the greatest medical, dental and nurse training center in the world, our St. Paul's Church is offering a kindly welcome to students, and is serving their everyday needs through social activities, Bible study classes and pastoral visitation.

At the University of Wisconsin, Wesley Hall, the first unit of a new building, located near the south entrance of the campus, is the center of the activities of a university pastor and a staff of trained assistants who teach, advise, and offer social leadership to Methodist students numbering each year 1,700. A NEW NEGRO COLLEGE FOR THE NORTH the states covered in the Lexington Annual Conference. To these it is estimated that one half of the Negroes migrating from the South have gone in the last five years. The Negro population for these states is as follows:

State	1900	1920
Ohio	96,901	186,187
Indiana	57,505	80,810
Illinois	85,078	182,274
Michigan	15,816	60,082
Wisconsin	2,542	5,204
Total	257,842	514,557

Negroes in large cities.—In the East North Central states are also the following large cities, with their large Negro population. Although these cities are included in the state statistics, their Negro population is placed in a separate table because of the relation which these centers of Negroes bear to Methodist Episcopal Churches among the Negroes:

City	Negroes in 1920	Negroes in Methodist Episcopal Church
Cincinnati, Ohio	30,079	1,451
Columbus, Ohio	22,181	1,009
Cleveland, Ohio	34,451	1,534
Dayton, Ohio	9,025	204
Springfield, Ohio	7,025	515
Toledo, Ohio	5,691	41
Youngstown, Ohio	6,662	227
Indianapolis, Ind.	34,678	1,087
Gary, Ind.	16,460	367
Evansville, Ind.	6,394	81
Cairo, Ill.	5,000
Chicago, Ill.	100,458	5,260
East St. Louis, Ill.	7,437	126
Detroit, Mich.	40,838	516
Milwaukee, Wis.	2,229

It will be seen that of the total Negro population of 514,557, fifteen of the large cities have 328,608, leaving but 185,949 in the smaller towns and rural sections. In the Lexington Conference there are 24,269 Negro members.

Negroes in northern schools.—The claim is that the Negro children seldom go further in their education than the eighth grade. Very few are to be found in the high schools and fewer still in the universities and colleges. The high schools of the city are open to the Negroes, but they do not enter. The Negroes graduated compared with the number of eligibles are very few.

A new institution needed.—In the East North Central states there is but one institution of learning specifically for the Negro worth the naming, located in Ohio at Wilberforce, known as Wilberforce University. This institution is filled to capacity. The plant was originally the property of the old Cincinnati Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is now owned and operated by the African Methodist Episcopal Church. The authority of the Board of Education for Negroes under its charter to operate an institution north of the Ohio River seems ample. The question seems to be solely one of adequate means for the purchase of a site, the erection of necessary buildings, equipment for the same, and its maintenance as a full-fledged standard college of first rank.

Christian philanthropy.—Hospitals, orphanages, old people's homes, baby folds, homes for working girls, homes for unfortunates—all these and others tell the story of the heart of a church quickened to care for the sick and aged, to help the needy and the wayward, and to minister in love to those who for one reason or another have fallen by life's wayside. Forty-four such institutions, scattered through the five states, are Methodism's witness to a belief in works of mercy.

Bible distribution.—In 1921, Scriptures in forty-six languages were supplied to this territory. The program calls for co-operation with the churches in the Bible distribution; the establishment of a depository in every large center of population; the maintenance of colporteurs among the Italian, Bohemian, Polish, Slovak, Roumanian, Jewish and Russian colonies; and the enlistment of voluntary workers for Bible distribution.

Woman's Home Missions.—Classes for children in city slums, homes for working girls, educational work among Indian women and children, rescue homes, orphanages, old people's homes—such a list indicates something of the extent of the Christian service being rendered by the Woman's Home Missionary society in the East North Central states. The measure of total achievement can never be taken.

Pleasant, Northport, Charlevoix, Elk Rapids, Mikado, L'Anse, Algonquin, Hermansville and Pequaming, Michigan, and at Oneida and Odanah, Wisconsin.

THE MISSIONARY NEED

The story of need can only be indicated by typical cases:

Rapidly growing industrial neighborhood, where church is only social center aside from saloons, pool rooms and public dance halls.

Seven outlying communities in one parish, entirely without religious work.

Eight communities along a railroad in a new agricultural community, have no religious services at all.

A church of twenty-six members in a parish of 792 square miles, with two villages and twenty lumber camps, is struggling heroically.

A flourishing Sunday school in a mining camp which has been homeless, moving from place to place to find shelter.

These students of Purdue University are in classes at the First Methodist Episcopal Church

Methodist Hospital, Indianapolis, Indiana

The oldest church in a large city, in a thickly populated section of 50,000 people, finds its members moving away and needy Armenians, Bulgarians, Austrians, Italians, and other foreigners moving in.

In another large city, there are nine Methodist Episcopal congregations among the Negroes, and only one of these occupies a worthy building.

A circuit in a section rapidly changing from lumbering to agriculture.

New site and building material required in a parish of 7,000 people of eight nationalities in lumbering and iron ore region.

In a fast growing industrial city, missionary aid will make possible the erection of eight new church buildings and eight new parsonages badly needed.

Five Methodist churches around one county seat were abandoned during the war for lack of ministers, and are still unsupplied.

A church in industrial community of 1,200 people has received sixty-one young men into membership in recent months. One-room frame structure, too far gone for repair, greatly handicaps efforts to reach many others.

A Negro congregation in a district of 10,000 Negroes, is housed in a one-room, abandoned school building. A corporation will donate the site if the congregation will build.

Large colonies of German-speaking Russians in Michigan and Ohio, have only a few mission churches ministering to them.

The largest Belgian settlement in the world outside of Flanders is in Illinois. There is need for Christian literature and a bi-lingual leader.

A coke town of 4,000 unchurched people, half of whom are under twenty-one years of age. Methodist responsibility.

Methodist settlement in city congested district, ministering to social and religious needs of native Americans and Italians, must enlarge to meet demands.

Italian Methodist Episcopal congregation has erected a new building, but needs help in support of pastor.

A growing industrial center has four Methodist Sunday schools, not one with a church building. Two meet in school houses, one in a tar paper shack and another in a store.

WEST NORTH CENTRAL STATES

A CENTER OF TRADITIONAL AMERICANISM

The West North Central states of today are sometimes called the "New England of yesterday." Here life is still largely rural, and the population is mostly made up of descendants of the pioneers of native stock. The westward wave of industrialism has not yet swept across the Mississippi river, and the cultural emphasis still holds supreme. The little red school houses have grown up into colleges and universities, while the little brown churches have become centers of strength and service.

This traditional Americanism in its full flower is both materially and spiritually progressive. Along with the development of fine churches and schools has gone the steady improvement of farm and home. Where a short half century ago the prairie schooners trekked across the plains, the motor car now reigns supreme. There are a few cities where sharp class lines are drawn; some mining and lumbering sections, backward hill regions, and sparsely settled frontier areas where extreme conditions prevail; but as a rule the people belong to that great middle class, individualistic in their thinking and social in their action. They are neither very wealthy nor very poor, but in normally prosperous circumstances which foster a strong home, community, church and school life.

THE REGION CHARACTERIZED

People and occupations.—The seven states in this division have a population of 12,544,249, of whom 7,816,877, or 62.3 per cent are rural, and 4,727,372, or 37.7 per cent are urban. That a city-ward movement is under way, the same as elsewhere in the United States is indicated by the change in percentages from 1890, when the rural population was 74.2 per cent and the urban 25.8 per cent. The population growth as a whole has been slow, registering for the decade of 1910-1920 only 7.8 per cent. The total number of foreign-born is 1,371,961, large numbers of whom are from northern Europe and more easily Americanized. The Negro population is 278,521, an increase of 14.8 per cent. Illiteracy is here at its lowest point in the United States, only 193,221, or two per cent coming under that classification.

The largest iron ore mines in the world are to be found in Minnesota, also important lumbering, shipping, and flour-milling industries. Large lead and zinc mines are found in Missouri; coal mines in Iowa and Kansas; oil wells in Kansas; and gold, silver, and lead mines in South Dakota. The industrial development of the cities varies, but rests primarily on the products of the soil in the given regions.

In God's garden.—The panorama that unfolds for the traveler is one of enchantment. He is in a vast garden—God's garden, someone has called it—where fields of wheat and fields of corn seem to stretch endlessly. They called it the "great American desert" in the long ago, when the distant gold fields of the Pacific lured multitudes across it. Little did they dream, as they took their painful, ox-team pilgrimage along the trails, that under their feet was wealth untold. It waited only the coming of the settler to yield its riches. Today that desert in truth blossoms as the rose, and the disdained prairies have become the "bread basket of the world."

Asbury Hospital, Minneapolis, Minnesota

The crops of grain, however, are not the largest harvest of these states. Closely allied with the tilling of the soil is the cultivation of character. Contact with the soil seems to bring a consciousness of God.

The fellowship of the soil.—In the words of a great Norwegian man of letters, the growth of the soil and the worker go hand in hand:

"There you are, living in touch with heaven and earth, one with all these wide deep rooted things. . . . Look, nature's there, for you and yours to have and enjoy. Man and nature don't bombard each other, but agree; they don't compete, race one against the other, but go together. . . . You've everything to live on, everything to live for, everything to believe in; being born and bringing forth, you are the needful on earth. . . . 'Tis you that maintain life."

METHODIST PIONEERING

The product of missions.—Here where life still clings to the soil, churches of Christ flourish and bring forth a large harvest. Villages, towns, and cities are dotted with the spires and towers of the temples of worship. Nowhere in America is Protestantism more virile or more vitally related to the individual and social life. Its fruitage is a strong missionary interest which reaches around the world.

The religious life of the West North Central states today is the product of home missions for the last half century or more. Nowhere is there a more striking example of struggling missions in frontier settlements becoming, through missionary aid, gloriously strong churches, giving of their wealth, their strength, their prayers, their manhood and their womanhood for the extension of the kingdom of Christ in congested cities, in isolated country sections, and in far-flung mission fields. Most of the educational institutions of these states were founded on the religious impulse, and many of them are still maintained by the denominations.

The first church in Iowa was the Methodist Episcopal church which was organized at Burlington in 1834; and the second was another Methodist church, at Dubuque. Of the thousands of Methodist Episcopal churches which were founded in the ensuing half or three-quarters of a century, 80 per cent are said to be the direct results of home mission work. Other denominations throughout this region credit from 75 to 95 per cent of their present churches, most of them self-supporting and benevolent, to home mission labors of other years.

In Kansas, a Methodist home missionary founded the State Agricultural College, while other home missionaries started the State Normal School and the State University. The church colleges which dot Kansas and the other states of the division are likewise a testimony to home mission statesmanship.

The measure of present Methodism.—Today the church sees as the visible result of its labors a membership of 643,213 in the West North Central states, of which 606,191 are white English-speaking, 19,389 German, 6,834 Scandinavian, and 10,237 Negro; a Sunday-school enrolment of 767,913, of which 730,969 are white English-speaking, 24,319 German, 7,021 Scandinavian, and 4,981 Negro; 4,564 churches, of which 4,089 are white English-speaking, 226 German, 117 Scandinavian, and 123 Negro. The total valuation of all churches and parsonages is $48,198,288, while the total paid for local expenses in 1922 was $11,170,396, and for benevolences $3,585,587, or a total for all purposes of $14,755,983, or $22.94 per capita for all purposes. There are also twenty colleges, universities, and training schools, and thirty-four hospitals, orphanages, and old people's homes in these states, maintained under Methodist Episcopal auspices.

Case Library, Baker University, Baldwin, Kansas

PROBLEMS FOR THE CHURCH

The rural situation.—The problem of Methodism is not primarily one of more churches, but of adaptation to the changing needs of the communities in which the churches are located.

Bishop Homer C. Stuntz has put the whole situation in a few sentences:

"We are attempting to check the down-grade movement among our rural churches. The country population of the states is almost stationary. In some places it is decreasing. The high prices of farm lands and the increasing number of tenant farmers are operating to check immigration and to force young men looking forward to agriculture as a livelihood to seek cheaper land. The coming of the automobile and other influences like the radio are steadily working against the country church. We are doing our utmost to make such combinations of country churches with the churches in towns near which they are located and with one another in the open country as will conserve the membership we already have there, and minister to the growing youth of these scattered communities."

Adapting the country church.—The telephone, the rural free delivery, the interurban railway, the automobile, the radio, the improvement of roads and other physical betterments have broken down

University Methodist Episcopal Church,
Salina, Kansas

Community building in rural Iowa, Sergeant Bluff, Iowa

most of the isolation of the West North Central states. Modern farm machinery and improved farming methods give more leisure time to rural dwellers, except for the short busy seasons of harvest and planting. A new social life is developing, centering around the larger villages and towns. The one-room school is being superseded by the consolidated, graded school, and the little country churches are finding their members either moving to towns or transferring their memberships there.

This problem of the country church is not one of a single denomination, but of denominational co-operation. The need is for one strong evangelical Protestant church in a community, ministering to social as well as spiritual needs, guiding the thoughts and efforts for community betterment, and providing a recreational life which will overcome the church-alienating, commercialized amusements which are drawing so many young people today away from church and religious influences, and which, through their very purposelessness and uselessness, are blighting the spiritual life. The church with the trained leadership, with seven-day-a-week program, with a desire to help and to serve its people in every phase of their lives; the church which seeks to make a better world as well as to get people ready for heaven; the church with the full-rounded program of personal and social ministry such as Jesus preached and practiced, that church is winning in the rural field today.

"Out where the West begins."—Although North Dakota is the only one of the West North Central states included in "the frontier" as defined by the Methodist Episcopal Church, the western portions of the Dakotas, Nebraska, and Kansas still have much of the pioneer flavor. The missionary problems that go along with sparsely settled areas are here to be found. Vast prairies, given over to "dry farming"; great grain fields; immense ranches devoted to cattle raising—these mark most of this territory. But there is some mining, and some irrigation. Development is steadily going ahead and there is a curious mixture of the old frontier and modern farming in the process. Methodism is at the front in these fields.

Up in South Dakota, the Aberdeen district extends 312 miles east and west and seventy-two miles north and south. Practically one-third of it still is virgin plain. The district includes 18,990 square miles of land, with a population averaging 8.4 persons to the square mile. It has but one town with more than 2,500 people.

Unchurched groups.—The "lumber jacks of the Northern woods" like the southern highlander, are familiar in song and story. They need greatly both a social and religious ministry. In the mining camps, particularly of Missouri and Kansas, are thousands of foreign-speaking inhabitants, whose problems are the same as of the rural industrial communities of the East. In a region where the native population is more predominant, these foreign-speaking people are the more conscious of their isolation and the more readily misunderstand and are misunderstood.

Bible colporteur on the ranges of northern Minnesota

Western highlanders.—

The mountain people of the Ozarks in Missouri are the one "highlander" group of the West North Central states. Here in a territory stretching across part of Missouri and Arkansas is a section which seems to have been lifted bodily out of the mountains of the Old South and to have been transplanted with all its illiteracy, primitiveness, superstition, and poverty, and also offering the same need for education, evangelism, and community service.

The migrants.—A picturesque group, to which the church has just begun to realize that it owes a ministry, is composed of the many thousand migrants who work in the harvest fields of the West North Central and West South Central states every year.

Among them are professional seasonal workers, such as are found in railroad work, in the ice fields, in the lumber camps, and in the closed season haunting the cheap lodging houses of the city; college students, earning money for an education; vacationists, out for extra money; householders, securing leave of absence to work during the harvest season. In most any harvest crew will be found married and unmarried men, educated and uneducated, wanderers and ambitious students, students for the ministry and profane atheists, personal workers and sceptics.

The West North Central cities.—While the West North Central states are essentially rural, the importance of their cities is not to be minimized. Seven cities of more than 100,000 population are located in the seven states. St. Louis, with 772,897 people, is the leader, followed in order of size by Minneapolis, Kansas City, Missouri; St. Paul, Omaha, Des Moines, and Kansas City, Kansas. While the growth of these cities has been steady, and in some instances rapid, it has not been meteoric such as some of the highly industrialized cities of the East have known. Industry and commerce hold a high place in their advancement, but it has been usually a variety of industries which has been responsible. The cities are more of the traditionally American type, with a comparatively strong religious life.

St. Louis, by an official survey, is shown to be 77 per cent native-born white, 13 per cent foreign-born, and 10 per cent Negro. Of those employed, 40 per cent are in industry, 15 per cent in the trades, 14 per cent in clerical positions, and 5 per cent in the professions. Religiously, 36 per cent are Protestant, 39 per cent Roman Catholic, and 3 per cent Jewish. One-fifth admit no interest in any church. "St. Louis is prosperous," says the survey, "yet over one-half of her people live below the average of human welfare and 30 per cent under distinctly subnormal conditions."

In spite of many churches, the tendency of the cities is towards congestion and social cleavage. The outward movement of populations is causing the "downtown church" problem, and there is need of adaptation to the various types of city communities the same as in the eastern cities.

This adaptation requires, however, leadership trained to the specific city task and equipment commensurate with the need.

METHODISM AT THE FRONT

Linking town and country.—The social and economic changes under way throw an added responsibility on the village and town churches. Likewise, the increasing distractions of commercialized amusements and community effort with no church affiliations tend to sever the church's contact with the people. The church's answer must be a ministry which touches all the needs of the parish. It should be the connecting link between town and country life and the center of the social as well as the religious expression of both.

In Kearney, Nebraska, our church is proving the feasibility and the value of such a program. The town church has linked itself with the rural parishes of Elizabeth Valley, Buda School House, Haven Chapel, and Alfalfa Center, and has developed a well-rounded program for all. The Kearney church building is never closed. During 1922, 50,000 people made use of its facilities on week-days. The farmers and their families make large use of the attractive rest-room and reading room when in town shopping. A radio helps to furnish entertainment. There is provided an employment and information bureau, and a gymnasium and social center. Neighborhood programs are arranged for the rural parishes.

The Rapid City district.—Seven hundred members were recruited by the sixty-four Methodist Episcopal preaching places in the sparsely settled territory of the Rapid City District, Dakota Conference, during 1922, a witness to the fact that the church can adapt itself to frontier conditions. The district covers a territory as large as the combined area of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. It has a population of 93,292 people, of whom more than 25,000 are children of school age. The country is settled for the most part by homesteaders of meagre resources, so the territory is largely missionary.

Rebuilding a county.—What a pastor can accomplish in community betterment if he is willing to exercise energy, leadership, and consecration finds its epitome in the experience of Phelps County, Missouri. The Methodist Episcopal pastor launched the Phelps County Development Federation, with a farm bureau to secure a county agricultural agent, prepare or secure bulletins on crops, organize farmers' institutes, and plan exhibits at fairs; a welfare bureau, to devise a county home for the unfortunate poor, and to offer a constructive plan for dealing with poverty and benevolence; a school bureau, for advancing public education; a road bureau, to study highway needs and encourage road building; an organization bureau, to aid in the formation of commercial clubs and other community organizations; and a recreation center bureau, to arrange social excursions from one part of the county to another, to give support to centrally located picnics, and otherwise "to make provision for development of social gatherings which will encourage broader acquaintance among Phelps County people." Circuits of school houses were arranged for popular addresses on better farming and entertainments.

In other fields.—A term spent by the pastor at a summer school for rural pastors has resulted in a community church at Hastings, Iowa, where a program of steady advance is maintained. Church and Sunday-school and Epworth League membership is rapidly increasing. A membership increase of 650 per cent in three years has been achieved at the Waite Park church, St. Cloud, Minnesota, partially through the help given by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension. The Methodist Episcopal Church at Wathena, Kansas, in nine months received ninety-three new members, and has entered into a community social and recreational program. An antiquated church building has given place to a fine new building at Walton, Kansas, which has become the social center of the village and surrounding country.

Among the miners.—In the Albia Mission, among the coal mining camps of Iowa, a missionary, member of the coal miners' union, was put in charge of the work. He began by making surveys of the camps, opening Sunday schools, organizing preaching services and prayer meetings. Within a few months, four churches were organized in as many different camps, and seven Sunday schools started. Preaching services were held in the five other camps, in school houses, homes or wherever room could be secured. The population of the camps varies from 200 to 1,900, with many foreign-speaking people and many Negroes.

Centering around Pittsburg, Kansas, are a number of coal mining camps with 30,000 foreign-speaking people, mostly Italians. A parish program has been worked out in connection with the Pittsburg Church, under the name of the Crawford County Mission, calling for community centers in a number of the larger mining towns, and with a mission organization patterned after that of the Coke Mission of Pennsylvania.

Revelations of a survey.—One of the camps, with 600 population, composed of Italians, Austrians, Slovaks, Americans, and others, has no religious work whatever. Another of 3,000 people has a few churches but no community centers save the pool halls. In still another of 900 people, with Italians, Austrians, Poles and Slovaks, and a radical element predominating, there is no social, civic, or religious work whatever.

With the assistance of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension progress has begun in religious work in these camps. Frontenac, with twenty-eight languages represented in its constituency, has enlarged its church facilities and added a community hall with a gymnasium. Excellent contacts have been made with the miners' families, and all creeds and nationalities are served. This is Americanization at its best.

Helping harvest toilers.—A rural service department director, a county agricultural agent, and a Methodist pastor planned one of the first programs of service to these migrant workers. At Larned, Kansas, sleeping and entertainment rooms were arranged, meal tickets given to needy men when rain delayed work in the fields, writing materials furnished, neighborly meetings promoted, and a kindly spirit toward the harvesters fostered among the town and country people. Much the same provision was made for them as for the soldiers by the "Y" huts during the war. The response was so remarkable that many other communities were organized to do similar work.

In the cities.—The city churches of the West North Central states are among the most active in America. Made up of mostly a native American people, a large proportion of them directly from the smaller towns and open country, or only one generation removed, the city problem in this area has not yet become so compelling or so complex as of the industrial cities of the east. There are foreign-speaking colonies in nearly all of these western cities, but they are not so large as to be dominant or to displace the native-born population.

Simpson Methodist Episcopal Church of Minneapolis, is a shining example of a successful city church, growing in membership from around 400 to more than 1,500 in two years and a half. Hundreds are frequently turned away from its doors at Sunday services, for the pastor adapts the church's program to city needs.

A successful "downtown" church.—Located in the congested downtown area of St. Paul is the Central Park Methodist Episcopal Church. A survey showed within a radius of four blocks 8,081 people of twenty-three nationalities and twenty-six religious denominations, 2,669 children, and 2,619 roomers and boarders. In a mile radius live 60,000 people. The church building, thirty-three years old, was of the conventional type until Centenary help enabled complete remodeling, and launched a community program.

The spiritual results of four years' labor, as far as figures can portray them, give striking proof of the value of the adapted city church. Between 1918 and 1922, the church membership increased from 642 to 1,107; the number of families reached by the church from 382 to over 600; the Sunday-school enrolment from 514 to 959; the vacation Bible school enrolment from 191 to 496; the winter week-night school from 118 to 416. In 1918, the neighborhood of the church was the center of juvenile crime in St. Paul. It has been driven back by the social and religious program until no child has been arrested in two years within three or four blocks of the church in any direction.

Other city churches.—Trinity Church, St. Louis, is located in a semi-downtown changing community of 70,000 people, most of whom have migrated from rural regions to work in the industries. Under the inspiration of help from the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, a program has been launched which bids fair to demonstrate beyond a doubt the value of an adapted ministry and a trained leadership for these difficult and challenging situations. Excellent community equipment has been provided for the Wagoner Memorial Church, St. Louis, enabling it to develop a program of social and religious service.

Woodland Community Church of Duluth has risen out of the ashes of an old church, with the aid of home mission help. It was enabled to secure a better location and a modern building. The community is growing very fast and the church is keeping pace.

A community survey once a year enables the Rustin Avenue Church of Sioux City, Iowa, to keep record of new families moving into its parish. Calling on new families is done by both pastor and people. Its community work enables it to establish contacts with many not otherwise obtainable. As a result the church membership in a few years has been more than doubled, the Sunday-school enrolment largely increased, the budget trebled and benevolences increased 600 per cent.

Among the Negroes.—While the largest part of the Negro migration north in the last decade has settled in the industrial cities east of the Mississippi River, the influx in the western part of the United States also has been large. A substantial gift by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension made possible the erection of a modern plant in one of the most populous Negro sections of St. Louis for the Asbury Memorial Church, which had been worshipping in a store room and which it had greatly outgrown. An appropriation also enabled the Negro Methodist Episcopal Church at St. Joseph, Missouri, to complete its auditorium and community center, by means of which it has greatly expanded its work. The church has made itself a part of the life of the community through its recreational and social facilities as well as its church services. Within fifteen months the Haddock Methodist Episcopal Church at Sioux City, Iowa, developed from nothing into a church with institutional activities. Besides a full program of church services, it has organized tennis, baseball and volley ball clubs for boys, recreational clubs for girls, maintains a library and night school and has formed a community association.

Foreign-language conference churches.—Early day settlement, in the West North Central states, by colonies of German, Swedish and Scandinavian people resulted in the establishment of many churches in their native languages, which continue to this day. With the drift of their children to English language and customs, many of these people have co-operated with their children in adapting their programs so that part of the services might be held in English. A few have made beginnings toward community programs, while a large number hold fast to the traditional services of worship in their respective languages.

The First Swedish Methodist Episcopal Church at Minneapolis is one of the oldest of Swedish Methodism in America. The destruction of the building by fire a few years ago called for help from the church at large in the plans for the future.

Rush County, Kansas, is largely populated by German-speaking Russians and the Methodist Episcopal church has about a dozen churches throughout the community. Russians converted in the churches of this community have returned to Russia and have aided our Methodist centers there. A new church has been erected at Bison, and is exerting a widespread influence for the Kingdom.

In Wright City, Missouri, is a German Methodist Episcopal Church, long on the verge of closing, which has erected a new building and developed into a strong community center. Centenary aid made possible the new building project, and through it various elements were fused and a church developed to serve all classes and types.

Successful evangelism.—A district evangelist in one section of Iowa worked during 1922 in eleven charges, seven of which had been closed during the war. In one church forty were at the altar and twenty joined the church, an old debt was wiped out, the pastor's salary was increased, and a new spirit possesses the church. In another charge with an unpainted and run-down church building which had been closed for seven years and where the parsonage was used as a junk shop, a Sunday school of one hundred was enrolled and an Epworth League of twenty was organized. There are thirty-five members in the re-organized church, the finances are in good condition, a community program is in operation, and the church is the most popular place in town. A little out-appointment was reopened and the former membership of sixteen increased to fifty, and the handful of Sunday-school members increased to ninety-three.

Hospital evangelism.—Rochester, Minnesota, is the world-famous "hospital city." The genius of the Mayo brothers has resulted in this little mid-western city becoming one of the world meccas for physical relief. Sixty-five thousand sick people come every year from almost every corner of the world for treatment. From 175,000 to 200,000 people pass through the city yearly. More than one patient in every six is a Methodist, and the same proportion would obtain among the other transients, making more than 10,000 Methodist patients and from 25,000 to 30,000 Methodist visitors in Rochester yearly.

To serve these on the bed of pain and those of anxious heart who accompany them, the department of evangelism of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension maintains a chaplain at Rochester.

This chaplain averages about a thousand calls a month; writes and sends many letters and telegrams to friends of the sick; answers many inquiries about hotels, rooms and board, hospitals, doctors, surgeons, and operations; meets trains; seeks to comfort those who are dying; tries to hearten many discouraged ones over serious operations, puts himself at the service of every sick person with whom he comes in contact; answers special calls at all hours of the day and night; prays with people and tells of the Good Shepherd and the Great Physician, and often points the way to inquiring souls; baptizes and administers the Lord's Supper; now and then marries a couple; conducts funerals; teaches in the Bible school, and preaches in the churches.

The Goodwill Industries. — Three Goodwill Industries are located in the West North Central states: at St. Louis, St. Paul, and Duluth. In St. Paul, an abandoned church and parsonage of another denomination was purchased and houses the Goodwill Industries and the Goodwill Day Nursery. More than forty-four people gather daily for chapel service before they go to their work in the Industries. In St. Louis, the Goodwill Industries had their genesis in the institutional activities of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church in the East End. A large, new building has been started, but is as yet uncompleted on account of lack of funds. However, from the part of the building usable, the Industries have gone steadily ahead in their activities, in 1922 giving employment to an average of thirty-two persons each day, and making sales of $28,172 in restored articles.

The field of education. — Where the forces of Christianity are to be found in such strength as the West North Central states, education, as one of them, has made great forward strides. This is true not only of colleges and universities, but also of the program of religious education.

The Epworth League in this section finds one of its strongholds. Iowa ranks high in the development of Junior League work and in Epworth League institutes. Three districts, Council Bluffs, Des Moines, and Atlantic, each support a district deaconess. The Wichita Area is one of the most highly organized with respect to Epworth League work, over seventy-five per cent of the churches having chapters. The Area has officially adopted the twenty-four-hour-day plan of finance and through it supports an Epworth League secretary for the area and is pledged to the support of Epworth League work in India. There is need for the development of group training conferences for intensive cultivation of League leaders. Twenty-one Epworth League institutes were held in this section in 1922.

Schools and colleges.—A deep spiritual life as well as high educational standards is characteristic of the Methodist Episcopal colleges, universities and training schools of these states. From them have gone out hundreds of ministers, missionaries, teachers, physicians and other professional men to carry the Gospel of Christ around the world. Difficult city churches and rural parishes are finding a rich source of leadership in these western colleges. Their alumni rolls contain impressive lists of men and women, serving in varied fields, who almost uniformly are actuated by the Christian impulse. Their achievements at home and abroad attest the value of the Christian college and definitely show that it is vital to the expansion of the kingdom of Christ throughout the world that denominational schools continue to develop and to be supported adequately.

The fervor of John Wesley lives in western Methodism and finds its expression in many ways. It is of interest to note how the Christian educational impulse hearkens back to Methodism's founder by the naming of institutions after him. Eight of the eighteen Methodist colleges and secondary schools in the West North Central states are named after the church's founder; these and all the others noted on the map on the next page, although not bearing his name have the same devoted spirit of John Wesley.

Methodism at other institutions.—The Wesley Foundations throughout the West North Central states report nearly 10,000 students in their constituencies. Student work is maintained at fourteen different centers, in varying degree, from a well-established foundation with student pastor and full social and religious program to a student ministry in the local church. New building projects are under way at Minneapolis; Ames, Iowa; Rolla, Missouri; Lincoln, Nebraska; and Hays, Kansas. There are also large opportunities ripe for development at Lawrence and Manhattan, Kansas. Ames, in three years, sent seven agriculturally trained missionaries to the foreign field.

Probably in no section of America will Methodist students be found in greater proportion in the state educational institutions than in these seven states. Bishop Stuntz states that out of 4,100 students at Iowa State University 1,100 are members of the Methodist Episcopal church and 380 are of Methodist preference, making a Methodist constituency of 1,480 students; that 1,790 out of 4,400 students at the State Agricultural College at Ames are Methodist; and that one-third of the students for the last six years at each of these institutions have been Methodist.

For the year ending in June, 1922, there were enrolled in the University of Minnesota 8,943 students, of whom more than 1,200 were of Methodist preference. Many of the students became full members of the church, others affiliate members. Thirteen are preparing for full-time Christian service. A ten-year program has been adopted, which when fulfilled will make it one of the outstanding Wesley Foundations of the country.

Other educational activities.—The total number of summer conferences reaches fifty-four, including Epworth League and Sunday-school institutes, schools for city pastors, summer schools for town and rural pastors, summer schools of theology, and missionary summer conferences of the Woman's Home Missionary Society and the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society.

Rural leadership also is emphasized by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, and enters largely into the progressive life of this distinctly rural region. Eleven of the thirty-four rural leadership departments maintained in as many different Methodist educational institutions are located in the West North Central states.

Other achievements.—Thirty-four hospitals, homes, orphanages, and other centers of mercy indicate the philanthropic achievements of our church in these states. A noteworthy feature is the great expansion of Methodist hospitals. The American Bible Society maintains a depository in Duluth and serves the territory also from the Chicago and Denver offices. At least twenty more Bible visitors could be used. Seven Indian missions are located in this division. The Woman's Home Missionary Society has two training schools. The call to the church.—Though the churches of the West North Central states are fighting a good fight and are keeping the faith, the summons to advance must be sounded. Whether it be in the pioneer stretches of the western border, with scattered settlements and primitive conditions, in the increasingly congested cities, the mountain sections of Missouri, the foreign-speaking urban and rural colonies, or the vast rich countryside and villages and towns where dwell most of the people, there is need for the hosts of the Kingdom ever to be at their task.

TYPICAL NEEDS

Here are a few of the missionary needs of the West North Central states:

A community hall for an Indian village where no provision is made for recreation.

A Negro community work in a congested city colony.

Church buildings and community houses for mining camps without any religious service whatever.

Complete a building in an industrial suburb with a polyglot population.

A woman worker in an iron range community of 9,000 foreign-speaking people.

New church and community house in industrial city of several thousand people, where one-room church serves. Children meet in damp, dark basement, and whole building is overcrowded.

Enlarge church to minister to 500 students in nearby college.

Community church for town of 8,000 people, founded by atheists who forbade any church for many years. Methodist church has the field.

Aid in replacing numerous one-room country church buildings on frontier.

Establish a community center in Ozarks.

Finish Scandinavian church left uncompleted because of financial depression.

Help for church in a town whose business section was wiped out by fire.

New church in industrial community of 3,000 Bohemians, Italians, Russians and Mexicans.

New community church for Negro congregation now worshipping in a store.

Numerous rural demonstration centers, and work among lumberjacks.

Maintenance for churches in frontier fields badly stricken by several years' drought.

Rebuild church destroyed by fire, congregation now worshipping in school house.

Develop Wesley Foundations.

Complete a downtown city center for working girls.

Supporting rural program at seven points with population of 8,000 people.

Purchase an abandoned church of another denomination for community center.

Provide automobile for hospital chaplain.

Replace Negro church now condemned as unsafe and unfit.

Expand church activities in industrial community of 17,000, sole Methodist responsibility.

Reopen six abandoned Methodist churches in the Northwest.

New churches to reach large colonies of German-speaking Russians.

Enlargement of church in a community of 6,000 Bohemians in one city.

Foreign-language pastors for needy communities.

THE OLD SOUTH AND THE NEW

If the father of his country were to awake from his sleep at Mount Vernon, on the banks of the Potomac, and journey southward to the far shores of the expanded nation, he would pass through a land which spans three centuries in its present-day life. He might travel by the ox-team and springless cart of the eighteenth century; the carriage and horse of the nineteenth century; the automobile and airplane of the twentieth century. He might tarry for a day at the log hut of a mountaineer, who farms with a hoe and whose wife operates the spinning wheel, as in the days of the Revolution; he might journey on to a cotton or cane plantation where Negroes work in the field, much as in the days of the Civil War; he might end his pilgrimage in a modern industrial city, where the roar of strange machinery and the habits and customs of twentieth century living would be as of another world.

Such is the strange contrast as it is found in that changing empire called the South Atlantic states. The section is one of varied complex. One of the oldest divisions of the United States, much of it of Colonial setting, it holds stretches of territory where people dwell in primitive contentment, unaware of the civilization which has passed them by, leaving them a century or two behind the times. Here, too, a process of fundamental change has begun, and industrialism, which has swept agriculture out of first place in the occupations of American people, has started its conquest. It means that a new South is being born out of the old.

Peoples and occupations.—The faddist in "undiluted Americanism" will find in the 13,990,272 people who live in that sweep of the Atlantic Coast from Maryland to the southern tip of Florida, a situation to delight his heart, so far as nationalities are concerned. It is populated by an almost exclusively native people, of the white and black races. Only 315,920, or 2.3 per cent, are foreign born, one of the lowest percentages in the United States. The dominating problem which presents itself to the church, therefore, is not one of fusing nationalities, as in the case of vast regions of the industrial North, but in inter-relating the white and Negro races, and in improving the conditions and opportunities of each. Almost one third, or 4,325,120, of the people are Negroes.

Vestiges of the Old South

The growth registered in the South Atlantic states in the decade of 1910-1920 was 1,795,377 people, or 14.7 per cent. This is approximately the same for the United States at large, 14.9 per cent. A distinctive feature and an especially hopeful one from the standpoint of the church, at least for the present, is that the section is essentially a rural one, 9,651,480 people, or 69 per cent, being classified as rural, and 4,338,792, or 31 per cent, as urban.

If, however, the above percentages are contrasted with the figures for 1890, when the South Atlantic states registered 80.5 per cent rural and only 19.5 per cent urban, the universal American tendency of drift toward the city even in this still largely unindustrialized section of the South is apparent.

The types of people and the occupations are extremely varied. In Delaware and Maryland, farms, shipping, manufactures, and fisheries afford employment. In Washington, D. C., almost the entire activity is governmental, between 110,000 to 120,000 being so employed. In Virginia and West Virginia, agriculture, coal mining, manufacturing, and shipbuilding are the leading occupations, while in North and South Carolina agriculture and lumbering vie with the rapidly growing textile industries. Georgia is a noted agricultural state, with 25,000,000 of its 40,000,000 acres in settled farms. Yet, in the last census, manufacturing has surpassed agriculture in relative importance, so great has been the development of the cotton mill industry. Florida presents the anomaly of a far southern state with a distinctly northern atmosphere, due to its climate and winter resort attractions and agricultural development, which have attracted many thousands of northerners either to live there permanently or at least six months out of every year.

Illiteracy.—With all the social ills which ignorance and superstition bring in their wake, illiteracy is here more prolific than in any other section of the United States, with the single exception of the group immediately adjoining at the West, the East South Central states. Out of the 13,990,272 inhabitants in the South Atlantic states, there are 1,212,942 illiterate persons, or 11.5 per cent of those ten years of age or older. Distinct hope lies in the fact that, as the result of the work of both church and state, this percentage has been reduced from 16 in 1910 to 11.5 in 1920. The greatest illiteracy is among the Negroes, 25.2 per cent.

The District of Columbia, of course, shows the least illiteracy, with 2.8 per cent. Among the states, Maryland has the best record, with only 5.6 per cent illiteracy. South Carolina has the worst, with 18.1 per cent.

New blood in the veins.—Shifts in population and migration from the North are causing upheavals in many areas which have known little change from the atmosphere and setting of the "Old South" for a century. Colonization movements for the old farming regions of Virginia have brought in many aggressive young farmers from the middle west, inaugurating a new era of live-stock husbandry and fruit raising. Great numbers of northerners also have flocked in, buying up estates and country homes in the mountains. Development of the mining industry is causing rural people of both white and Negro races to move to industrial centers, creating serious social and religious problems, imperatively demanding the attention of both church and community.

The textile expansion in the Carolinas and Georgia affords one of the marvels of twentieth-century America. Good shipping facilities, both rail and water; much water power and raw materials available; and increasing labor troubles and industrial friction to the north, especially in New England, have caused the removal of many mills to the Carolinas and Georgia. South Carolina, with 4,974,460 spindles, stands second only to

But even the dominantly rural, agricultural South feels the pull toward the city and its industrialism

Massachusetts in the production of cloth.

Industrialism and child labor.—This industrialism is causing one of the greatest social changes in these old southern states. Cheap labor is sought, and with no foreign-born element to draw upon, as in the North, recourse is had to the mountain people. Great numbers of these have been induced, by the offer of higher income than the bare subsistence afforded by mountain life, to leave their mountain cabins and to work in the mills. Whole families are engaged in the cotton mills, sometimes performing long hours of exhausting toil.

It is here that child labor is at its worst. Often the ignorance of these credulous highlanders is capitalized by exacting employers. Insanitation, bad working conditions, and poor nourishment, added to the deadening effect of mechanical toil on boys and girls of ten and twelve years, as well as older, portend social disaster. These sinister conditions hurl out at the Christian church a challenge to remove from the borders of a so-called Christian nation a condition of barbarism bred by an unchristian industrialism.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

The fruits of service.—Heroic vision and sacrificial service are golden threads woven into the fabric of achievement of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the South Atlantic states since it began its extensive missionary work there more than half a century ago. Today the fruit of that toil is found in the record of 3,696 Methodist Episcopal churches of which 2,128 are for white people and 1,550 for Negroes; in the recorded membership of 398,579 persons, of whom 236,259 are white and 161,153 are Negro; in the Sunday-school enrolment of 409,952, of whom 296,981 are white and 111,580 Negro. Delaware has the highest proportion of members of the Methodist Episcopal Church of any state in the Union, or 120 members to each 1,000 population. The total gifts for all purposes were $6,252,630, of which $4,707,930 was paid by the white congregations, and $1,514,330 by the Negro. The per capita giving for all purposes was $15.69.

A bit of history.—When the Civil War ended and 4,000,000 Negroes were thrown on self-support, the Methodist Episcopal Church entered upon a ministry to them which was to prove of profound significance. On December 25, 1865, it organized a mission conference with a dozen Negro preachers, not one of whom could read or write. The work rapidly extended until in the General Conference in Chicago in 1868, delegates of eleven new mission conferences in the far South, including not only portions of the present South Atlantic states, but of other southern sections as well, were received.

The ministry which the Methodist Episcopal Church began rendering in the South to white people after the division in 1844-45 and continuing since, and among the Negroes after the Civil War, was a welcomed and sought-after ministry, not a forced one. The mountain peoples of that territory stretching down like a long arm through and between the South Atlantic and East South Central states held firm, as a group, in their loyalty to the Union throughout the period of unrest and agitation preceding the war and during the war itself. They wanted and sought the ministry of the church of the North. The work among the Negroes was, at first, of necessity, a task for the church from the North.

Bishop Hartzell speaks.—Bishop Hartzell has told the story in this way:

"There was serious trouble over the proposed dividing territorial line. In 1848 the Methodist Episcopal Church General Conference unanimously decided to extend its work further south. Later the Church South General Conference extended its work northward wherever the way opened. In 1876, with the cordial approval of both General Conferences, a joint commission was appointed to 'remove all obstacles to formal fraternity between the two churches.' The co-ordinate relations of the two churches as branches of Episcopal Methodism were affirmed, and provision was made for settling property titles. The work of the Methodist Episcopal Church was then organized in the whole South, and one of the first administrative acts of the commission was to confirm property titles to three churches occupied by Methodist Episcopal congregations in the city of New Orleans. When the appointment of the Commission on Fraternity was arranged for, the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church called special attention to work of that church in the southern states as an integral part of its responsibility. All property difficulties between the churches were in the southern states. That action confirmed the legal and moral right of either church to extend its work wherever it felt providentially called."

Education and philanthropy.—Education and philanthropic and social service are broad avenues to a missionary evangelism which the Methodist Episcopal Church has followed in its effective ministry throughout the South. Noteworthy are the growth in churches and members and the development of educational institutions.

In the South Atlantic states will be found fifteen of our educational institutions, of which eight are for white people and seven for Negroes. Student work is conducted at two non-Methodist educational institutions. Twelve hospitals, orphanages, and old people's homes also are maintained.

PROBLEMS WHICH CHALLENGE THE CHURCH

The new industrial regime.—The rapid development of manufacturing and mining in the South Atlantic states means that there will be a relocation of populations, a draining of the rural regions to supply labor, an increasing foreign-speaking element, greater congestion in the cities, more exploitation of child labor—if the aroused conscience of the nation does not find means to prevent it—and all the other intensification of evil conditions which deprave, both socially and morally.

The exploitation of child labor and oppressive working conditions point to a repetition of those evils which have brought such industrial warfare and bitterness in other manufacturing centers.

It is not a condition of undevelopment, as among the superstitious whites of the highlands or the ignorant Negroes of the plantations, but rather is it a condition of perverted development. Industrial expansion itself is not the problem, but the social conditions which industrialism by its present standards permits and fosters in very many cases—congested housing, insanitation, exhausting hours, and exploitation of the workers in multifarious ways.

The southern Negro.—The North knows the Negro almost exclusively as a city dweller, engaged in unskilled work. It is difficult to visualize him as a farmer, as he is seldom seen on a northern farm. In the South, however, the Negro population is largely rural.

Composing more than 4,000,000 of the population of the South Atlantic states, the Negroes inevitably present an opportunity for vast missionary service. The range in percentage of colored people in the different states of the section is very great. It varies from 5.9 per cent in West

A diminutive black agriculturalist from Georgia

Virginia to 51.4 per cent in South Carolina. The District of Columbia is twenty-five per cent Negro, while in Maryland and Delaware the percentage is very much smaller. Virginia is 29.9 per cent Negro, North Carolina 29.8, and Florida 34 per cent. Georgia has the largest Negro population.

Many of the Negroes of these states have made astonishing progress since their emancipation, and credit must be given to their heroic spirit and determination to conquer in spite of difficulties. Credit goes also to many sympathetic white people of the South who have aided these Negroes in their fight for financial independence, and to the northern people who, principally through the churches, have poured out their money and personal service to help them. The sectional spirit, however, which still is rife in the more backward regions is a veritable barrier to the development of other thousands of Negroes.

Achievements of the Negroes must not go unrecognized, but in this presentation the achievements yet to be recorded are the paramount issue, and, therefore, the problems incident thereto must be emphasized.

The forces of harm.—Two-thirds of the Negro farmers of the South are renters. One-third of them own their farms. In Georgia, alone, 4,498,836 acres are farmed by Negro tenants. The significance of these facts lies in the accompanying conditions, primitive methods of cultivating the soil, irresponsibility, low development, miserable housing, and a system of practical slavery effected through the maintenance of "plantation stores" whereby the Negro workers are kept continuously in debt. This latter situation, however, is said to be becoming less acute.

In brief, the Negro through disfranchisement and oppression has been kept in a well-nigh hopeless, helpless condition. Ignorance has made him the prey of diseases of the mind, and insanitary conditions the victim of diseases of the body. Educational facilities on a par with those accorded the white people have been denied to the Negro in most of the South Atlantic states.

In the District of Columbia alone does the Negro population receive its proportionate share of school money to educate its children. Maryland, Delaware, and West Virginia come next nearest to providing equal opportunities of education, but in the other states the discrepancy is glaring. Virginia and Florida spend less than one-fourth as much on Negro education as white, in proportion to population, while North Carolina spends about one-fifth, Georgia about one-seventh and South Carolina about one-eighth. The number of Negro children entirely out of school is even more appalling. The range is from 26.5 per cent in Delaware to fifty-two per cent in Georgia.

Forces of progress.—Progress has been made among the Negroes of the South where the northern and southern missionary agencies have been at work. This is shown in less illiteracy, larger ownership of land, more wealth, better schools, and improved social conditions. Morals also are much higher.

A current movement in the south seeks to improve race relations and give the Negro his proper chance at work and education. This is reflected in larger appropriations for Negro education by the southern states and in a better inter-racial feeling. In our own church, the situation calls for more buildings and more leadership for the work conducted by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension and the Board of Education for Negroes.

Opportunities in student centers.—One of the greatest college and university sections of America is to be found in the northern part of the South Atlantic states. Here for many decades some of the choicest young minds have come for training, and from here many of the leaders in national and world affairs have gone out. Such a student center of achievement and influence calls from the church the very flower of its spiritual leadership in order to impart the definitely religious viewpoint on life to the hosts of young people who will be directing affairs in the coming generation.

In Washington, D. C., are located the American University, George Washington University, Howard University for Negroes, two normal schools for the training of teachers, and two Roman Catholic universities. Hundreds of students from the nation over are at Johns Hopkins University and Goucher College in Baltimore and at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis. Virginia is far-famed for its institutions of higher learning, among them the University of Virginia, founded by Thomas Jefferson, located at Charlottesville; Washington and Lee University at Lexington; and William and Mary College at Williamsburg, the oldest in the United States, and the alma mater of Phi Beta Kappa. Hampton Normal School at Hampton, Virginia, was the first well developed school for Negroes established in the South.

The primitive highlanders.—Strange as it may seem, the purest strain of American blood to be found today is in the most backward section of the United States. Hidden away in the picturesque slopes and ravines of the Appalachian mountains, these descendants of a "lost race" live in their log cabins, run barefooted, marry in childhood, cherish their superstitions, fight out their feuds, and talk in the language and live by the customs of pre-Revolutionary days. Nowhere in American life are more romantic people to be found, and their quaint ways and manners have been sung in story until they are familiar to nearly every mind.

Romance may serve to thrill, but it often serves to hide. So has it served in the public mind, hiding the deprivations, the miserable surroundings and conditions, and the general mental, physical and spiritual blight endured by these descendants of fine old Colonial stock, potentially one of the greatest sources of American talent and idealism.

Between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 of them are scattered throughout the southern states, principally in a strip about 1,000 miles long, which follows the mountain levels from Virginia and West Virginia through the Carolinas, Kentucky, Tennessee into Alabama and Georgia.

Mountain woman, hand to plow

The religion of the hills.—A small proportion of them are very religious, but as a class the mountain people are below the average. Church services are not regular, once in a month or two is a heavy average, and the preachers are as illiterate as their congregations. Church buildings are old, decrepit, one-room cabin affairs, and many of the communities have no churches or services at all. Their belief is little more than a superstition, opposes a trained ministry, holds to denominational bigotry, and permits the relentless feuds which have saturated the southern hills with blood for generations, often long after the cause of disagreement has been forgotten. It is an old saying that if a highlander likes you he will die for you, and if he dislikes you, you will probably die for him.

Both northern and southern churches have long carried on their missionary work among these mountain people, establishing colleges, industrial schools, agricultural schools, churches, and mission stations; and furnishing teachers, nurses, physicians, and pastors to minister to their needs and provide education.

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT WORK

Building the Kingdom.—While conditions of dire poverty and distressing ignorance have called for an unusual emphasis upon education and social service, the Methodist Episcopal Church has been true to its Great Commission in the South Atlantic states.

Its evangelism can be seen in the roll of its membership, already cited, or in the stories of splendid work done in congested city districts, in lonely mountain communities, in fertile farming regions or among the plantation Negroes.

Dead churches revived, static and discouraged congregations enlivened and enlarged, and a large harvest of converted men and women, boys and girls, brought into the Kingdom, form some of the results of sustained evangelistic effort.

A fifty-two year old frame church was insufficient to meet the needs of a rapidly growing section of Baltimore. Hard-working people who composed the membership and appreciated the need of a new church tried heroically to float it alone. In co-operation with the Baltimore City Missionary and Church Extension Society and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, the new Summerfield Methodist Episcopal Church was erected in a parish where dwelt 450 Methodist families, and where there were 600 other Protestant families inadequately cared for spiritually. Scores had to be turned away at every service in the old structure. The new plant has adequate Sunday-school and social rooms, an auditorium seating 900, a gymnasium and other features. In one year the membership has grown from 259 to 373, and a Sunday school of 700 members is already outgrowing its new quarters.

Stories that thrill.—Church members gathering stones for a foundation is indicative of a warm desire for a new building. Such was the happening at Johnsville, Maryland, where for ten years the people had been saving for a new church and yet the total savings were only $100! With help from the church at large they built a new $4,000 building. In the first year thereafter, 235 people were converted!

"Give, and ye shall receive," might be the revised admonition to the Methodist Episcopal Church at large, by virtue of a strange happening in a little church to which it gave a friendly hand. The Charles Wesley Church at Centreville, Maryland, not long ago was discouraged. Its debt was increasing instead of decreasing and its property was suffering from lack of care. Then help came from the church at large. The debt was cut in half, the buildings renovated and restored, and here's the punch to the story—benevolent giving was largely increased. So heartened was the congregation that where before it had given $45 a year to home and foreign missions, it raised the amount to more than $400!

Turning people away at prayer-meeting frequently occurs at the winter resort cities of Florida. Standing room is often at a premium and at the regular church services hundreds cannot get inside. Local congregations are struggling bravely to provide the equipment necessary to meet the great hosts of visitors, but in many cases they are unable to carry the burden alone.

Good and faithful servants.—Similarly splendid achievements are to be recorded of the work among the Negroes of the South Atlantic states.

To a Negro pastor from South Carolina, the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension gave a scholarship to attend the school for rural pastors at Gammon Theological Seminary at a cost of only $20. Fired with zeal, he returned and doubled the benevolent giving of his church, the net increase so far being $600.

Redeeming a community.—Vice and waywardness have received a body blow in the Negro community of 5,000 or more people in Annapolis, Maryland, through the zeal of Asbury Methodist Episcopal Church in providing a community house as well as services of worship. The pastor and congregation believe in worship and in prayer meetings and also in the church being the recreational and social center instead of the street corner or saloons and commercialized loafing places.

Besides the resident colored people, there are 250 to 500 Negro sailors stationed at the Naval Academy as mess attendants and in other work. There was no Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A. or club rooms for any of these, and the social needs were desperate. The new three-story building has twenty-one rooms which are beehives of activity for clubs, games, library, and office. There is a playground large enough to care for scores of children. Athletic events are encouraged, field days observed, boy and girl scout work regularly carried on, and music classes developed. The wholesome ministry of the church and community house is felt throughout the entire section.

A modern Negro city church.—In the Sharp Street Memorial Church, Baltimore, where the church at large and the congregation worked together in the erection of a $75,000 community house, one hundred and ten conversions were reported in a single year, mostly among people who were first led into the church through its community welfare undertakings.

The parish plan.—The development of the "parish plan" by the Rural Department of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension is being tried out with success in the Lansing Parish of the Blue Ridge-Atlantic Conference. Twenty-six churches which nestle among the high mountains of western North Carolina form the parish. Trained leadership is provided and a program laid out to bring each one of the churches to the standard of regular services every Sunday, with all departments organized and functioning.

A trained leadership.—The South Buckhannon Circuit in the West Virginia conference was for years an eight-point circuit, paying a salary of $850. Adrian, a school house appointment on that circuit, paid $60 a year as its share of the salary and had twenty members. Under strong and better leadership and more thorough cultivation of the field the entire circuit has been greatly strengthened. Adrian has now a church and parsonage property costing $18,000. Of this amount $1,700 was appropriated by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension. The membership of that church has now reached 200. The circuit at the present time employs one full time minister and two part time men and pays a total salary of $3,200.

Help from the church at large has enabled the Methodist Episcopal Church at Cecilton, Maryland, to enlarge its service not only to the residents, but also far into the open country. For a half century a one-room brick church was the sole equipment. Then new leadership and funds and an aroused vision on the part of the people made possible a splendid community house. Volunteer labor was furnished for the excavating and hauling of material. The building is now in use seven days of the week and is counteracting the evil influences prevalent in so many rural communities.

In Winston-Salem, North Carolina, a full equipped building in the down-town center has been purchased from the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and a good work is under way. This is our only church in a city of 50,000, to which large numbers of people are moving from the mountain districts in order to work in the industries.

A young Negro pastor in Virginia, quickened by his contacts and inspiration at the summer school at Gammon Theological Seminary, was sent to a church which was worshipping in an old building standing more than a century. In nine months a new church was built and dedicated, the parsonage remodelled, the pastor's salary increased to a living standard, and the church put on an aggressive and successful basis.

Educational achievements.—Goucher college at Baltimore and the American University at Washington are typical institutions of higher learning, of Methodist origin and development, and of prestige and influence which transcend all lines of denomination. The West Virginia Wesleyan College, at Buckhannon, West Virginia offers courses in liberal arts, music, the fine arts, and oratory. It was founded in the same spirit as its predecessor, Clarksburg Academy, to meet the pioneer hardships in the lack of schools for the children.

Negro education.—In the field of Negro education, Atlanta, Georgia, is, in a large way, the hub of activities for the Methodist Episcopal Church. Here are located Gammon Theological Seminary and Clark University, familiar throughout the educational and religious world as institutions of influence and power, and known, through the leadership being trained, as the molders of a race.

Our church at Johnsville, Maryland

Gammon Theological Seminary.—Few institutions have exerted a more profound influence in the development of a race than Gammon Theological Seminary. As practically the "only well-equipped, well-endowed, and well-manned theological seminary for the training of Negro preachers in the world," it has for forty years been uplifting and clarifying the standards of the Christian ministry among the Negroes and training students for the broad service so necessary to overcome the religious blight brought on by an illiterate, superstitious, and transient leadership. Gammon Theological Seminary, in training an educated as well as a consecrated ministry, is laying the foundations for winning generations yet to come to Christ.

The work being done by the rural extension department of Gammon Seminary reaches throughout the south. It takes on three phases: work within the school; supervision of student pastors; and co-operation with district superintendents and pastors on the field. Courses are offered in rural sociology, rural economics, and public health. The extension department is the point of contact between the teaching of the classroom and the demonstration on the field.

Clark University.—Clark University is looked upon as the university center of the Methodist Episcopal Church for the Negroes of the South, and as such has developed into an institution of far-reaching scholastic and religious influence. It enrolls more than five hundred students who come from many states. As a result of the Centenary, the new administration building, Leete Hall, named after Bishop Leete, has been completed at a cost of $200,000, enabling the school to expand its teaching facilities. High educational and spiritual standards are maintained at Clark University, and it is rated as one of the outstanding enterprises of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Clafin University.—Another important center of Negro education is Clafin University, located at Orangeburg, South Carolina. The plant is composed of seven well-equipped brick and five frame buildings. Complete high school and college courses are offered. Clafin University has had, in its history, a total enrolment of about 20,000 students, and has graduated from all departments about 1,200 students. As a result of the annual revivals, about 2,500 students have professed Christ as their personal Savior. A historic service to the church and to the Kingdom of God has recently closed with the resignation of the presidency of Clafin College by Dr. L. M. Dunton. He served the colored people of South Carolina for fifty years, forty years in connection with Clafin College. In that half century, Dr. Dunton's labors have definitely reached for Christian consecration more than 50,000 lives.

Bennett College.—Forty years of achievement written into the lives of a multitude of splendid Christian men and women is the record of Bennett College, located at Greensboro, N. C. From its halls have gone two men to be elected to the office of Bishop, R. E. Jones and M. W. Clair. Others among the alumni are successful physicians, ministers, teachers, merchants, nurses, and farmers. For years Bennett College went heroically along at its task, crowding its halls and accommodations to the limit and yet having to turn away applicants. Its buildings and equipment became less and less serviceable, until an awakened church started in on a new era of efficiency by providing new structures for those worn out or destroyed by fire. The enrolment is in excess of 300.

Morgan College.—An institution which radiates constructive influence among the colored people of both North and South is Morgan College, located at Baltimore, Maryland, in a strategic position to reach thousands of Negroes. Recently relocated with the aid of the Centenary, on a beautiful site of eighty-five acres in the suburbs of the city, with fifteen buildings, the college is in a position greatly to expand its work. In 1922, it had 599 students and forty-two teachers. The Morgan College Corporation, in addition to its Baltimore institution, has holdings of 117 acres and ten buildings at Princess Anne Academy, the eastern branch of the University of Maryland. The college provides industrial, agricultural, home economics, normal, collegiate, and graduate education courses. More than two hundred Negro students are now preparing for teaching.

Cookman Institute.—The first school for the higher education of Negroes to be established in Florida is Cookman Institute, located at Jacksonville, Florida. It is a worthy institution with a splendid history, and renders a wholesome influence for Christian education and consecration to a widespread community.

Women's educational work.—The training of young women in the far-flung fields of social service and religious education is the program of the Lucy Webb Hayes National Training School, including the Sibley Memorial Hospital and Robinson Hall, at Washington, D. C., the work of which is connected up with the church at large through the Woman's Home Missionary Society and the General Deaconess Board. Here Christian young women are trained to become nurses, deaconesses, missionaries, church secretaries, directors of religious education, social service workers, domestic science teachers, or kindergarten teachers. Through connections with churches, settlement houses, the Associated Charities, the hospital and other institutions, splendid opportunities for field work are provided.

Fields of opportunity open.—Great opportunity awaits further activity for the religious care of the needy young people of the South Atlantic states, of both the white and Negro races. The stories already told of backward communities, of ignorance, of depraving conditions, morally, and of the general physical, mental, moral and spiritual stagnation among thousands of poverty-stricken illiterates—these revelations find their greatest tragedy in the blighted and barren lives of boys and girls who would develop if they could.

The Sunday-school work.—So pitiful are these conditions that the contrast is made all the greater between these communities and the more progressive cities and towns where the church and social life have kept pace with the times in development and influence. To enlarge and improve the Sunday-school work, the Board of Sunday Schools has four members of its extension field force in the South Atlantic states. Two of them are white and two are Negro. The success of these few workers giving themselves to the promotion of larger and better Sunday schools warrants the faith that a greatly increased force of such workers would richly repay the church in spiritual results.

Epworth League activities.

—The Epworth League is carrying on a varied program in the South Atlantic states, including both a spiritual and social ministry. The leagues of Baltimore maintain an Aged People's Outing Association, providing summer vacations for needy and deserving old people. The Epworth League of the Rose-dale Methodist Episcopal Church at Washington has equipped a community playground for both young and old. Eight successful summer institutes were conducted in 1922.

The Goodwill Industries.—Two of the twenty-one Goodwill Industries affiliated with the Methodist Episcopal Church are located in the South Atlantic states—at Wilmington, Delaware and Baltimore, Maryland. Located at the old Broadway Methodist Episcopal Church, the Baltimore Goodwill Industries uses five different buildings, three of which it owns. More than 17,000 homes in the city use the "Goodwill" bags which two motor trucks, running daily, collect. Each truck averages fifty calls per day. There is a constantly increasing demand for the remade clothing and reclaimed furniture which the Goodwill Industries sell.

Wesley Foundations.—Provision is made for the social and spiritual care of Methodist students, at the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Maryland, and at West Virginia University, Morgantown, West Virginia. Special interest attaches to the Wesley Foundation activities at these institutions because at least 200 midshipmen of Methodist preference are located at Annapolis, while at Morgantown there is one of the largest Methodist Episcopal Churches in the country. The number of Methodist students at the West Virginia University increased from 650 to 800 during the last year. State-wide publicity was given to its Wesley Foundation activities through bulletins, speeches and letters. The Methodist Student Council was organized consisting of twenty-two representative students and two faculty members. Marked progress was made in church attendance, student Bible classes and Epworth League work.

The Bible in the South Atlantic states.—It is estimated that there are 150,000 families without Bibles in this section. There is need of Bible distribution and teaching to overcome the prevalent fanaticism, ignorance, and superstition.

Woman's Service.—An extensive and blessed service is being rendered by the Woman's Home Missionary Society in a widespread missionary and social service program throughout the South Atlantic states. Description of the work of each is impossible here, but stories of great achievement for the Kingdom of Christ are written into the records of the institutions which the society maintains in this section.

Vast missionary needs.—Neither tongue nor pen can portray the tremendous and appalling need of the backward districts of the South Atlantic states for the whole ministry of the church. It is true that great beginnings have been made, yet these are but the gateways to the larger opportunity. A river has been spanned, yet a whole sea lies just ahead. Poverty, illiteracy, ignorance, fanaticism, superstition, hatred, hopelessness—they tell the story. What more is needed to reveal the plight of those whom the church must succor?

In West Virginia there are 1,200 mining camps, at least 300 of which are spiritually destitute—children growing up in the darkness, parents living in deadly indifference. What can come but spiritual decay? In an industrial village of 1,400 people, mostly Spanish-speaking and Italian, in the same state, there is no church building of any kind. The superintendents of the plants have come asking that the Methodist Episcopal Church enter the field. Near

Sharp Street Memorial Church, Baltimore

Fairmont, Virginia, are twenty different mill and mining villages with a population of thousands of Italians and Slavs without a religious ministry. Five centers should be organized and adequate and practical buildings for Sunday school and community service should be established and the workers provided.

Of the many thousands of highlanders living in this section, probably less than ten per cent have adequate church connection or religious instruction.

Down in the Everglades sections of Florida, thousands of settlers have poured in from the north to make their homes on reclaimed lands. They need the ministry of their home church, yet whole communities are without religious services whatever.

In the very center of the Cherokee Indian section of North Carolina, the Indian Methodists are attempting to worship in a small, dilapidated, one-room shed. There is need for a suitable house of worship and a community center. The church has the opportunity of winning many of these Indians to Christ by providing a constructive ministry for them. There is no provision whatever for the social or recreational life of either old or young among them.

In a cotton milling center of 20,000 people, of whom 5,000 are Negroes, our church building is old, dilapidated. A community house is imperative to win the people from wrong indulgences and bring them into the way of the church, which also should have a modern building. A larger and more adequate program would contemplate the development of the parish plan, with a central church and outlying points of neighborhood service.

A summer-resort community with small church needs an adequate plant to minister to throngs who spend six months of the year there.

The Methodist church building in a fishing village of 2,000 has been condemned as unsafe. Help must come.

A city church in a poor neighborhood has a Sunday school of 700 children who meet in unsightly surroundings while others have to be turned away for lack of room. Proper equipment would double the ministry of this church in a short time.

Help is needed in a mining town of 2,500 to rebuild the church destroyed by fire; in a Negro community of 1,700 too poor to build alone; to save a situation in a community where people have pledged their farms as collateral for church debt and are now threatened by mortgage holders; to build a community house in a congested Negro community of 25,000; to move the Methodist work from an alley in a Negro community of 17,000 people; and to develop more demonstration churches in mountain communities.

The church's task.—The challenge for a great vision and heroic spirit, demanded of the church to meet the missionary needs of the South Atlantic states, was accepted long ago by the Methodist Episcopal Church and for many years it has toiled steadily onward toward the achievement of its goal. It is in the spirit of greater advance, rather than any retreat, in the present hour. It must labor at a varied task. It must toil in many ways. It must build churches among the thousands of unchurched people, white and colored. It must extend its schools and build more of them. More hospitals and homes and orphanages must follow. It must develop leadership which can not only build in new territory, but recreate where devastating teaching has done harm to the advancement of Christ's kingdom. It sorely needs a theological school in the South where the sons of the mountains can be trained and sent to the people whose psychology they understand and in whose condition they can live.

"For generations," says Bishop Richardson, concerning the backward sections of the South, "a part of the settled church teaching has been that education is wrong, evangelism foolish, missionary enterprise is unnecessary, and paying salaries to ministers is a sin. Against the lack of education and this settled theology, it is hard to contend."

EAST SOUTH CENTRAL STATES

NEW WARS FOR OLD

Amid the historic scenes of the Civil War, where grass grows green over old battlefields, where wounds of the spirit find healing in the touch of time, and where enemies in life gain comradeship in death, peace is now winning victories no less renowned than those of battle. The ground hallowed by the blood of brave men is again the setting for strife, not man against man, but man and God against the forces of ignorance and misunderstanding. New wars are replacing the old, that poverty and superstition may disappear and knowledge and wealth may take their place.

Nowhere is there a more interesting chapter in American progress than in these East South Central states—Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi—whose names have been written into American history in letters of crimson. Men of the Blue and men of the Gray who fought up and down and across these states in the dread fratricidal strife are living to see the day when their sons and daughters are uniting for a betterment of life and its opportunities.

Changes in the old South.—Developing industrial activities are drawing the rural people slowly but surely to the cities. Negroes are migrating north at a rapid rate. The isolated mountain life is breaking up. A new agriculture is evolving. But more profound than any of these is an essentially spiritual progress in overcoming ignorance and seeking after knowledge, and in a new social ministry and community rebuilding. It means a new day for the traditional South.

“Ye shall know the truth.”—The witness of this advancement is found in the steadily growing victory over illiteracy. Even today the East South Central states have the highest percentage of illiteracy in America, but the significance lies in its rapid reduction in the past decade—from 17.4 per cent in 1910 to 12.7 per cent in 1920. It means that the heroic efforts of the churches and the schools to provide education for the boys and girls of the backward regions of these states are not in vain. It signifies that the movement to banish illiteracy is gathering speed, and that the next census should reveal it cut in half.

Aunt Lydia, widow of a Union soldier

A part of the old South.—A glance at these four southern states will reveal that they comprise a section almost wholly native American. Out of a total population of 8,893,307 will be found only 71,939 who are foreign-born, or less than one per cent. The total Negro population is 2,523,532. The states are essentially rural, 77.6 per cent of the people living in the villages and open country, while only 22.4 per cent live in the cities. However, the urban population is growing more rapidly, for in 1890 the census showed 87.3 per cent rural and only 12.7 per cent urban.

Rural life is undergoing an economic as well as a social change. Boll-weevil inroads in the cotton fields are hastening diversified farming and rotation of crops.

More attention is being paid to grain and thoroughbred livestock. Cotton, cane, tobacco, and rice continue heavy in production. The changes, however, have meant a removal from the rut of half a century and consequent new ideas and thoughts of life. The general spirit of progress is an invitation to the church to strike out on new paths.

The growth of industrialism.—Numerous shifts in population also are to be noted, the white people to the cities, and the Negroes to the North. Industrialism is primarily responsible for both. Water power, nearness to coal fields and to sources of raw materials, harbor advantages, and exploitation of commercial opportunities, all these are factors in the growing manufacturing business of the South. At the same time, restrictions of immigration are causing the northern demand for labor to continue, and the Negro migration north, started during the late war, steadily continues. During the decade of 1910-1920, the East South Central states lost approximately five per cent of their Negro population, Kentucky leading with a loss of 9.8 per cent. Kentucky has the smallest proportion of Negro population, less than ten per cent, while Mississippi has the largest, 52.2 per cent.

Along with industry, mining also has developed tremendously, especially in the mountain regions of Eastern Kentucky and Tennessee. A number of the largest corporations in America have their own coal fields in the South, have constructed railroads into the mountain fastness and built their company towns. The miners are largely Negroes and highlanders, attracted by offers of higher wages. In some of these camps, excellent conditions prevail, in others they are very bad. Lumbering also continues as an important industry.

The larger cities.—Louisville, a typical southern city, is the metropolis of the area, with a population of 234,891. Birmingham, with 178,806 people, is known as the "Pittsburgh of the south" because of its great steel mills. Memphis, with 162,351 people and Nashville, 118,342 population, complete the list of cities with more than 100,000 people.

The church today.—The present status of the church and its activities, as far as statistics may reveal, in the East South Central states is as follows: 155,793 members, of whom 79,417 are white English-speaking, 75,059 Negro, and 1,317 German; 134,058 Sunday-school enrolment, of which 82,866 are white English-speaking pupils, 1,813 German, and 49,359 Negro; 1,878 church buildings, of which 923 are for white, English-speaking people, 949 for Negroes, and six for German. The total paid for all purposes was $1,615,177 for the year, or $10.37 per capita. The number of educational institutions is thirteen, six for Negroes, and seven for whites. There are also three hospitals.

Our church in the South.—From the pen of the venerable Bishop Hartzell the following summaries show that if we consider everything, especially the testing times during the Civil War and the reconstruction period following, the development has scarcely any, if any, parallel in Methodist annals:

"There are thirty-seven annual conferences, seventeen white and twenty Negro, each group covering the territory from Delaware to the Rio Grande, and together entitled to 180 delegates in the General Conference.

"These are the remarkable facts:

"Annual conferences, thirty-seven, with 3,814 traveling and 4,922 local preachers; full and preparatory members, 846,511, 483,353 white, and 363,156 Negro; church and parsonage properties, $49,170,988; seventy-three institutions of learning, a large proportion of high grade, with 1,196 teachers, 13,413 students, and properties valued at $13,649,142, including $4,969,626 in endowments; also two hospitals, with $675,000 properties. Total church, parsonage, school, and hospital properties $63,495,130. That is several million more than one-fifth of the net property of the whole church."

The problems of the field.—Why is there a missionary problem in the South? The South, of course, has its progressive cities, its wide-awake towns and villages, and large stretches of open country where flourishing churches are witnesses to progressive communities. The church is also the leading factor in the conservative and unchanging towns and districts which are reminiscent of days of long ago and retain the flavor of the "Old South." The South covers a vast geographical area, however, and not all its territory nor all its people are absorbed in these classifications.

In the mountains.—There are scores of counties in the East South Central states, as well as the South Atlantic states, where the highlanders dwell in poverty and woe-ful ignorance and superstition, so familiar in song and story. Estimates place the number dwelling in the mountainous territory stretching from Virginia to Alabama and Georgia at from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. They vary greatly in their conditions of life, from those in neighborhoods where some educational and social privileges are provided to other communities where extreme poverty, ignorance and isolation exist. A small proportion of the people are exceedingly religious in an emotional way, but the facts indicate that the masses are untouched. In ten counties of the Holston Conference not more than twenty-five per cent of the people belong to any church; everywhere church membership is small.

The program of the church, therefore, is more than the mere illiterate mountain "preachin'." In a number of the more isolated and needy mountain communities, the social, educational, and religious program of the Methodist Episcopal Church has achieved results in a short time far exceeding expectations. Public improvement of the roads has been stimulated and beginnings made in the development of agriculture suited to the mountains. Household arts and crafts are being renewed. The sentiment regarding the illicit manufacture of liquor has been definitely changed; and the local feuds resulting in frequent killings lessen as larger community interests prevail.

A new inter-racial attitude.—A change in attitude toward the Negro has begun to take place in the South. It is his star of hope. It is the omen of an era of justice and opportunity for him. The paramount cause of the changing attitude is the Christian spirit which has animated a growing group of southern white people to give to the Negro his due, social justice, economic opportunity, and a neighborly spirit. Their determination is to live the brotherhood of man, regardless of inherited prejudices or antagonisms. They seek to work out the so-called Negro problem on the basis of inter-racial good will, with justice for all; and are developing a national movement for the promotion of the spirit of Christian fraternalism, that it may be the basis of adjustment of all differences. Through hundreds of communities of both South and North, the leavening influence of an inter-racial adjustment is spreading.

Negro advance.—In spite of the many handicaps, however, the achievements of the Negroes from the close of the Civil War to the present time show racial characteristics of high ambition and great capacity for development. It has been said that there are few parallels, if any, in history, where a people have journeyed upward so quickly and so far. A gauge of that progress is in the following table:

Negro Accomplishments in Fifty-four Years

12,000	Homes owned	600,000
20,000	Farms operated	1,000,000

1,500,000	Valuation of church property	85,900,000

The shack where the Sunday school, pictured above, has to meet. To remodel this, outside aid is asked

Chief credit for that progress goes to the Negro himself. The aid of friendly whites in both the North and the South has been of inestimable value and profound inspiration. Were it not for the Negro's burning desire for better things, however, his willingness to undergo suffering for his principles, his zeal in sacrificing that his children might have an education and other advantages, and the flaming purpose of an evangel to invest life with a spiritual meaning as well as material significance, his help would have been in vain. As Bishop Robert E. Jones has well said, "Lincoln plighted his faith in the Negro; the great Lincoln, with his faith in the Negro, risked his all, his place in history, and the Negro made good his faith."

Yet a great need.—While this great progress is to be acknowledged, the tremendous missionary need among them must still be emphasized and the achievements of the past and present be made the augury for the future. The Methodist Episcopal Church has done much. It must needs do more.

The need of resident pastors.—The church must also substitute educated, progressive, resident pastors to take the place of the non-resident and often uneducated ministers. One of the blights of the southern rural church is the "absentee treatment" by ministers living in town and journeying to the country once a month or bi-monthly to hold services. On one short railroad journey in Mississippi, sixty-five preachers were counted on one train, going out to country appointments for over Sunday, to desert the fields on Monday for the town or city home.

More adequate buildings.—The church also faces the problem of replacing the old shacks in which it has attempted the ministry of Christ for decades. Some of our so-called "churches" in the rural South, especially in the Negro communities, are nothing but shanties handed down from slavery days or outworn, outgrown, and outlived clap-board buildings erected half a century ago.

The industrial fields.—The industrial situation, especially in the mining sections of eastern Kentucky and Tennessee, presents a tremendous problem for both church and community. Here thousands of Negroes and highlanders, accustomed to the open spaces and the freedom of rural life, have been drawn in for work in the mines and coke ovens. The abrupt changes in living and working conditions, poor enough before, in many instances have made for the worse. Racial prejudice is made keener by closer contacts. Hundreds, often thousands, of people have come into the camps within a few months to live and work. Church and social facilities often are woefully lacking.

Dangerous conditions.—One county reports seventy-nine mining camps only twelve of which have any social or religious work of any kind; in another county are seventy-eight camps, only ten of which have religious services. In other camps, churches and community halls have been erected by the companies and conditions are much better.

Over-churched and under-churched communities.—In those words are written the tragedy of ill-advised and unrelated missionary work by different denominations. Unholy competition by denominations in some neighborhoods, spiritual starvation in others, that is the story to make Christian people think and so to organize their activities that co-operation will be the keynote in the future. Such a situation can be found in many parts of the East South Central states and the nation.

A striking example is to be found in certain counties in Kentucky. Educational and commercial growth has been the most important development of the past twenty-five years in the eastern part of the state. Within that time, the church instead of keeping pace with educational and commercial advancement, seems to have followed a plan of retrenchment.

Taking the line of least resistance, the church has, as a rule, held to the well-beaten paths of the railroad and main water courses. In most every case, a church in an isolated community has, in the process of time, been abandoned. In Mason County, Kentucky, which is easily traveled, there are 17,760 people and 48 per cent of them are church members, while in Pike County, very hard to travel, with 49,477 people, only ten per cent of the people are church members. There are two or three churches at nearly every cross-roads in Mason County, while there are twenty-one communities with more than 1,000 people in Pike County without even an occasional religious service.

A VARIOUS MINISTRY

The ministry of service.—The church has long realized that poverty, isolation, ignorance, and insanitary conditions, as well as immorality and unbelief, are enemies of the kingdom of Christ and must be conquered. Therefore its service has been more than that of Sunday worship. It has aimed to regenerate communities socially and physically, to provide education of mind and heart, and, as the climax, to win disciples for the Master on the basis of Christianity as it is understood by the best minds and hearts of the church.

The correction of the weird and harmful beliefs which have been scattered abroad by illiterate "shouters" is a necessary part of that labor. If the program of the Christian church of today is anywhere near right at all, then perverted conceptions of Christianity must be replaced by sane interpretation. Judgment should be by the fruits of the two teachings. The accompaniment of the prevalent theology is social and spiritual depravity; of the missionary teaching, social and spiritual progress.

Trained leadership needed.—The solution of the problem is in a trained, intelligent leadership. Already definite steps have been taken through the establishment of professorships for rural training at Gammon Theological Seminary and at Baxter, McMoresville, Boaz, and Murphy Colleges, and through the holding of summer schools for rural pastors already in service.

The Negro pastor in a rural church is confronted with such conditions of disease, lack of sanitation, inadequate nourishment, poverty, and lack of social and educational opportunities that he must be equipped to lead his people to better things. The policy and program of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension is to minister to all of these various needs and thus bring a richer and fuller life to our Negro Americans.

"Demonstration" community centers.—"Sign-boards which point the way to better things" is the description which has been given to the six major and several minor centers of mountain work. Five of these are in Tennessee: Pittman Center, Beersheba Springs, Parham's Chapel, Luminary, and Patten Center.

Pittman Center.—Back in the hills of Sevier County, Tennessee, was found a remote mountain section. Here were 2,500 people, living in the most primitive manner. In not a single home was discovered anything pertaining to a bathroom, and screens were almost unknown. Contagious diseases spread and hookworm was prevalent. The health of the people was deplorable, so bad that vigorous work was almost impossible. There was only one doctor for 200 square miles of mountain gorges with a population of 5,000. The report of the draft board for the county indicated that seventy per cent of those between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five could not read or write. Only two newspapers were taken by 1,000 people. At one of the first community meetings ninety per cent of those present had never seen a movie or lantern slide lecture, and fifty per cent of the women had never seen a railroad.

A new day in the mountains.—It was decided that here was the strategic point for the location of a church community house and educational center, an institution which would change the miserable conditions not only of a neighborhood but of a whole section.

Work was begun at the site late in 1920. In early January, 1921, the contractor started pouring the concrete foundation, the cement, hardware, glass and equipment being hauled twenty-six miles over indescribable mountain roads. By August 15, the structure was ready for occupancy. On the first enrolment day of school 87 pupils registered, 125 at the end of the first week, and finally 300. The school is the only one in Eastern Tennessee which conducts an eight months' term, furnishing books and school supplies without cost. Many pupils walk daily from four to six miles to avail themselves of the advantages, and the teacher of the primary grades and the principal say they have never met classes which average better.

Dedication day at Patten Center
Community House

Pittman Center has class rooms for vocational and manual training, sanitary plumbing, the use of water power, carpentry, and agricultural shop work, and home economics quarters for girls, for cooking, sewing, knitting, and weaving. Classrooms with modern desks and blackboards, large casement windows and artistic draperies, a large auditorium, with stage and dressing room for entertainments, a library and other quarters and equipment, are also provided. It was a strange sight indeed to the mountaineers to whom kitchen ranges, electric lights, running hot water, and plumbing were mysteries! (Picture on page 343.)

The operation of the school, community center, and church is along four well-defined lines. They are:

1. Improvement of public health. Employment of a doctor on occasion and the maintenance of a community nurse. Public conveniences in the school and community building, constant instruction in matters of health, such as screening against flies, open window sleeping, right preparation of food and insistence on sanitary measures and precautions—all these are producing good results.

2. Development of better economic conditions. It was estimated that the average annual income, in products as well as cash, for a family of five persons in the community was $200. The agricultural department works to increase the yield of the land and to provide a market. Seed wheat is treated to prevent smut. Farmers are encouraged to buy fertilizers. New forage plants are grown to be used as a base for improving the small farm crops. Thorough-bred livestock is being introduced into the community. Fruit raising is being developed with a nursery of standard fruit tree varieties.

3. Establishment of modern education. The Pittman Center school is an official public school, the state recognizing it and aiding in its maintenance. The parsonage has been given up for a home for the school teachers.

4. Maintenance of a well-rounded evangelistic and religious educational program. All the teachers are expected to approach their work from the religious viewpoint and to lay emphasis on a modern religious program for the community. Prayer-meetings, Epworth Leagues, song services, Bible classes, social events and stereopticon lectures go hand in hand.

The fruitage.—Does such a broad policy pay as a missionary enterprise? It does. In a recent few months more than fifty conversions occurred in the Pittman Center charge, every one of which was a conscious, voluntary, and eager decision for Christ. There has been a tremendous improvement in the moral consciousness of the neighborhood, where formerly the moonshiner was a hero. Today he is looked upon as a lawbreaker. Feuds are being forgotten and fellowship is increasing as the larger community interests prevail. The crowning fact is that Pittman Center has twenty-five young men now preparing for the Gospel ministry—young men who, as trained leaders, will help to redeem, physically and spiritually, the wretched and blighted communities whence they came.

Other mountain lighthouses.—The John A. Patten Community Center at the village of Melvina, in the Sequatchie Valley, twelve miles from Pikeville, Tennessee, is another outstanding demonstration. The mountain walls, five hundred feet high, are underlaid with soft coal, not yet touched in a commercial way. Great quantities of timber are now being cut. Fifteen hundred people live within a radius of four miles. The school year averaged three and a half months in 1919, when we began our work. The buildings, one-room churches and school houses were very poor.

In addition to Patten Center, there are six small schools in isolated communities around the mountain rim. These small schools have one resident teacher each who gives time during the vacation period to religious and social welfare work. The average cost of each of these schools is about $300 a year and each school averages seventy-five in attendance.

This has been a feud section almost ever since its settlement. There were well defined lines between the parties and the feuds and killings continued until our work began. With full time workers resident in the community not a killing has occurred since our work was launched January 1, 1920.

This work among the highlanders is supervised by the superintendent of mountain work of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension. He has ten projects and twenty-seven workers.

The circuit-rider's field.—While trained leadership and demonstration community centers and churches are the far-vised program, immediate religious needs are being ministered to in the only manner possible with present resources and personnel, through the maintenance of as many preaching points and circuits as possible.

The church in the coal camps.—A new day is dawning for many of those coal camps of southeastern Kentucky where social and spiritual starvation is the rule. Three years ago the start was made at Black Mountain. So impressed was the community by the service rendered that it volunteered a per capita contribution to the support of the work. The charge became self-supporting. The district superintendent then received invitations to extend the work at twenty other mining camps, with promise of partial support.

The aim is to group camps around one of the points on a circuit, then put a strong man at the head of each group. It is hoped to establish social and industrial centers in the camps, of which there are more than fifty in southeastern Kentucky without organized social or religious effort.

The plan calls for the erection of a building in each camp for religious services, gymnasium, recreation and social purposes. One end of the building would have apartments for the workers.

Examples of success.—Crushing and hauling rock is often a prison punishment and is not often indulged in by church members in order to get a new building. Such was the happening at Somerset, Kentucky, a railroad and mining town of 8,000 people, where destructive influences menaced hundreds of men and boys. The Methodist Episcopal people decided on a community church. A site was secured, and aided by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, the people worked with their own hands at the task, and the first unit, with facilities for religious education, bowling alleys, game room, swimming pool, etc., was soon under way.

In the center of a coal mining region in Tennessee, we have a church and community house located at Jellico. Here a building with splendid facilities for worship and social purposes has recently been completed. It contains auditorium, reading rooms, banquet hall, gymnasium, and other quarters. The Sunday-school and church services are both well attended, while the community rooms are a beehive of activity.

Out of bondage.—That freedom may be a gift but its blessings must be earned was one of the first statesmanlike teachings which the Methodist Episcopal Church bore to the new freedmen when the shackles of slavery had been stricken from them. This policy has continued through the years as the church has labored to help the Negroes to help themselves. Churches and schools and the training of leadership have been the keynotes.

In the delta section.—In the Mississippi delta, there are 28,000 square miles of the most fertile soil in the world. Four hundred thousand Negroes live in the delta, and turn out one million bales of cotton annually. Almost all of the land is divided into plantations, some of them running into more than a thousand acres.

In the delta, six years ago, we had on what is now the Clarksdale and Sardis Districts, of the Upper Mississippi Conference, 1,200 members, and 1,000 Sunday-school children in twenty-six churches. We now have 2,024 members and 2,778 Sunday-school children in fifty-six churches. The benevolent collections increased from $359 to $3,766.

The plantation section.—The boundaries of the Upper Mississippi Conference embrace the greatest plantation section of the South. The churches are usually of the crudest and most neglected type. Of the 106 pastors in this Annual Conference, about one-half have been in attendance at one of our rural schools and thirty-two have regular weekly social and recreational programs. Better schools, more sanitary home surroundings and better church buildings are being developed.

The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has invested $27,317.50 in the building program of the Upper Mississippi Conference and $13,688.75 in leadership. This conference, which raised $11,424 during the three years prior to the Centenary, has paid to the Centenary treasurer up to October 31, 1922, $87,968.

A reconstructed circuit.—A striking example of the need to be found among the rural agricultural Negroes is told by the district superintendent of the Opelika District, Central Alabama Conference: "Ashland is a three point circuit of about twenty-four miles. At Spring Hill, there are fifty children enrolled in the public school, the people paying a teacher for four months in a year. Because the Negro school cannot secure a 'licensed teacher,' the state fund goes to the white school. The church here is a miserable structure. At Glades, one of the points on the circuit, fourteen miles from the railroad, we have a crude building without windows, the shutters being used to keep out the cold and rain. There is also a Baptist Church in Glades and each denomination is giving once a month service. A Gammon Theological Seminary graduate is now serving this circuit. He has received as little as $1.05 after driving fourteen miles to serve the Glades congregation. A small maintenance appropriation enables us to keep this trained man on this work. As a result, we have today at the central point a $4,500 church building, practically free from debt. The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension gave $1,100."

This achievement is typical of the work done on the entire Opelika District, where with trained leadership and a little aid, twelve churches and parsonages have been built or remodeled and a district program developed which, aside from Tuskegee Institute, is the greatest single factor in improving the economic, social, educational and religious life of the people.

One of the strongest Negro Methodist Episcopal churches in the South is located at Greenwood, Mississippi, an important town in the center of the Mississippi delta. It has a Negro population of 3,000. The church has a large auditorium with class rooms, club rooms and dining hall. A public library for Negroes is maintained in the building.

In the cities.—In a great industrial and manufacturing section of Chattanooga, the St. James Methodist Episcopal church is the only church and social center of any sort among 9,000 people.

In Birmingham, the first floor of a large plant for Negro work has been constructed. In Bessemer, Alabama, a thriving mill center, a fine new structure has been made possible by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension.

The service of these churches is as wide as human need. At Centenary Church, Memphis, people are turned away. The membership has doubled, the Sunday school quadrupled. Besides religious services, there are lessons in physical culture, a tea room, a story hour for children. At the Jackson Street Methodist Episcopal Church, Louisville, the church work includes boys' and girls' clubs, dramatic clubs, services for Negro soldiers, noon meetings in railroad shops, social welfare work at city hospital, employment agency, emergency lodgings, and social evenings.

Religious education.—The corner-stone of the missionary structure of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the south is education. It ranges from teaching little children the alphabet to training ministers for specialized leadership in their communities. Its aim is to uplift body, mind and soul. To this end all the agencies of the church give primary concern to religious education.

The Board of Sunday Schools now has two field directors in the East South Central states. The activities are as varied as the problems of the Sunday school. Enlarging existing Sunday schools, establishing efficient programs, securing better leadership, opening up new Sunday schools, reviving abandoned schools, and developing a missionary interest through all of them—these are some of the things being done. The missionary opportunity is an outstanding one from the Sunday-school standpoint. This is not only because of the lack of Sunday schools in many spiritually starved neighborhoods, but also because large families are the usual thing, especially in the backward regions.

Trained leadership sought.—In addition, many of the charges are circuits, which make it almost impossible for the pastor to have intensive supervision, were he trained for it, over the several communities committed to him. In these situations, a well-trained director of religious education would afford the minister the most valued reinforcement, and would do more perhaps than any other single type of service to give permanency to the work,

The Epworth League finds its problem, aside from the building up of its membership, is to provide the young people of the isolated mountain sections with educating and broadening influences. Among the Negroes, there is the problem of effecting standardized organization and programs for the young people. There is need for more institutes for both white and Negro groups and conferences for intensive training of League officers. There is need among the Negroes of specially prepared literature with emphasis on social service and recreational programs. For the white group, there is need for the acceptance of greater responsibility on the part of the young people in well established centers for their comrades in the sparsely settled sections.

Educational institutions.—In the fourteen colleges, universities, secondary schools, and professional schools, which the Methodist Episcopal Church has throughout these states, will be found a fountain of Christian influence and leadership.

The University of Chattanooga.—From inauspicious beginnings to a noteworthy university with 261 students and twenty-three faculty members is the romance of the University of Chattanooga. It comprises also within its jurisdiction the Athens School, Athens, Tennessee, a standard college preparatory and normal school with a faculty of twenty-five and a student body of 324.

Fortunately situated in a district holding more than a million people—a district of which Chattanooga is the metropolis, the university wields an influence for Christian education far greater than the mere number of enrolled students would seem to indicate.

Other centers of learning.—Union College at Barbourville, Kentucky, for the development of Christian leaders, contains departments of liberal arts and sciences, normal training, music and expression, and academy.

A quarter of a century ago some girls came out of the mountains and asked the wife of a Methodist preacher to give them "some book larnin'." She consented and opened her home to them. That was the beginning of the present John H. Snead Seminary, at Boaz, Alabama, a school where 1,000 students are now enrolled.

Located in the little town of Sevierville, Tennessee, is Murphy Collegiate Institute, with a record of transforming lives and sending out well-equipped boys and girls to live out useful careers and to render Christian service. From its halls have gone those who are teachers, missionaries, and builders of communities. It is said that within a radius of forty miles of Sevierville are 30,000 young people of school age. Murphy Collegiate Institute cares for 500 more. Baxter Seminary has an enrolment of 500, and strongly features religious education and the training of rural leaders.

Freedmen's progress.—Teaching a class of freedmen in the same room in which he was sold as a slave before the Civil War was the strange experience of a man now a member of the faculty of the Morristown Normal and Industrial College, Morristown, Tennessee. In that same room, his grandfather, mother, and himself were baptized. Today the school has 400 students, and has won the respect and friendship of both races. At Meridian, Mississippi, will be found Haven Institute, another splendid Negro work.

Walden College, located at Nashville, Tennessee, began its life in a church basement, and spent its childhood in a gun factory, erected for that purpose by the Confederate government but never used. For more than half a century it has been serving to advance Negro education in the south. Several other schools under the administration of the Negro Board of Education are doing splendid work in preparing of the Negro race for better things.

Meharry Medical College.—To be known as "the light-house of a race" would seem to be as high a goal as any institution could wish to attain. Yet such is Meharry Medical College, Nashville, Tennessee, from whose portals have gone from one-third to one-half the trained physicians, surgeons and dentists of the Negro race in America. Hundreds of them there are, scattered throughout the densely populated Negro areas of the south, in the old and new Negro colonies of the northern industrial cities, in fact wherever their people are congregated in numbers, eighty-seven of them are in Chicago alone. Highly trained in science, their professional education built upon the Christian foundation of service, these graduates, now approaching 3,000 in number, are doing more than healing bodies and prolonging life. Their profession brings them into close contact with folk of all types and conditions, and through such avenues of helpful service they instil new ideals and aspirations into the hearts of their people.

Philanthropic service.—Charitable work is done by the three hospitals at Louisville, Pikeville, and Nashville. The Deaconess Board serves in various ways. The Woman's Home Missionary Society directs its endeavors to the maintenance of academies, industrial homes for mountain girls and for educational and relief work among Negroes.

SOME CHALLENGING NEEDS

Here are typical individual and general needs of the Methodist Episcopal work in the East South Central states:

Complete a church building in an industrial community of 12,000 people. Building is partly erected but not inclosed. Pastor and two members have been laying brick. Sunday school meets in a moving picture hall. Great expansion will come with new building.

Minister to 14,000 men in 263 mining villages of Tennessee. Methodist Episcopal Church has effective work in only one.

Complete our only adequate church plant among 40,000 Negroes in one city.

Provide a woman worker in a city manufacturing community where vice and corruption prevail and where ours is the sole religious and social center.

Provide salary for missionary and assist in construction of chapels among Negro miners in spiritually destitute coal camps.

Build a parsonage in mountain center where pastor's home has been turned over to house school teachers.

Help to erect a church for a community of railroad shopmen. A site has been secured but building is halted awaiting aid.

Training school for rural pastors, Athens, Tennessee

Help a village congregation, now worshipping in an old storehouse, to erect a house of worship.

Assist in paying for new building for a highland school.

Save from bankruptcy a church building enterprise brought to a crisis by business and industrial depression.

Help to support woman worker in textile and iron mill town where workers are largely composed of former mountaineers.

Remodel building for community work in parish of 8,000 people.

Large amounts to make possible a building program to replace the disreputable shanties serving as churches throughout the poverty-stricken Negro sections of the East South Central states and among the destitute mountain people.

SPECIAL NEEDS

Such examples give a hint as to the needs of buildings and equipment for church work. There is just as crying a need for equipment, support and expansion of the training schools so that adequate leadership may be provided. These schools are striving desperately to maintain high standards of scholarship. Trained leadership is absolutely essential to community progress. Highlanders, who know the psychology and needs of their people, must be trained and sent back as ministers. Southern Negroes must likewise be equipped to serve. No greater statesmanship could be shown by the Methodist Episcopal Church than to meet these leadership training needs.

WEST SOUTH CENTRAL STATES

A COSMOPOLITAN EMPIRE

Contrast and color, high lights and shadows enter into the picture of the West South Central states. Here in a vast empire, where distances seem to fade away, will be found the Old South meeting the New West, and the New South crossing paths with the Old West.

The cowboy of the plains and the business man of the city, the old-time southern gentleman and the up-to-the-minute efficiency expert, the derrick worker of the oil fields and the farmer of the rich grain belt, the Mexican section hand and the Negro cotton picker, the coal miner and the mountaineer and the minister—all these are thrown together in the crucible of the development of this region.

State by state.—Arkansas and Louisiana form the western outpost of the old south, while

Texas and Oklahoma are in the process of change from the old west of the frontier to the new south of industry and stabilized agriculture. Arkansas, once derided in jest and story, is fast winning a deserved place in the sun because of its vast potential resources and its rapid development. It has extensive agricultural interests of cotton, grain and fruit, vast lumber and timber products, considerable coal, lead and manganese mining, important phosphate deposits, and a growing textile industry. There is a continuous influx of northern people, who engage in both agriculture and industry. Little Rock is fast becoming a typical northern city. Back in the hills are to be found many primitive mountain people, while the Negroes number 472,220 out of a population of 1,752,204.

Oklahoma, famous as the state which was made in a day, more than a quarter of a century ago, by the race of settlers who had lined up at the border and awaited the signal to go, has some of the element of the pioneer days left, such as ranches, cowboys, with their sombreros and "chaps," and blanketed Indians, but in most ways its development has brought it everything which appertains to modern life. It has fertile soil and a fine farm development. Its industrial life centers around oil production and refining; it ranks at the front by producing more than 100,000,000 barrels yearly.

Louisiana is still an old southern state, with the picturesque elements of its French population, its cotton plantations and its river traffic. Its industrial life centers around its heavy oil production, its exports and fisheries, although agriculture is its primary occupation.

Texas, the Lone Star State, embraces nearly eight per cent of the entire area of the United States. Roughly, its dimensions are 800 miles long and 800 miles wide. It is the only state in the union in which the crops, by the census reports, exceeded one billion dollars in value. It is first in cotton production. It has the largest railway mileage of any state. It has a heavy oil development and some large industries. There is extensive lumbering and some coal mining. The western portion is largely given over to stock raising.

Facts of the whole group.—The total population of the West South Central states is 10,242,224, of whom 2,063,579 are Negro and 459,333 are foreign-born. That it is an essentially rural area, second only to the East South Central States in percentage of rural population, is indicated by the census figures for 1920, showing 71 per cent rural and 29 per cent urban. In thirty years the shift has been from 84.9 per cent rural and 15.1 per cent urban. The rural population is 7,271,395, while the urban population is 2,970,829.

The number of illiterates reaches 773,637, or 10 per cent. The illiteracy among foreign-born whites is 29.9 per cent, as compared with 12.8 per cent in the South Atlantic states, and 13.1 per cent for all the United States. This is due largely to the Mexican immigration. The illiteracy among the Negroes is 25.3 per cent and among native whites 4.1 per cent. Louisiana registers the highest illiteracy in the United States, 21.9 per cent, of which 10.5 per cent is among the native whites, 21.9 per cent among the foreign-born and 38.5 per cent among the Negroes. The significant fact, however, is the reduction of this total percentage in a single decade from 29 per cent to 21.9 per cent. Oklahoma has the least illiteracy, only 3.8 per cent. Its Negro and foreign-born population is very small, compared to the other West South Central states.

The section registered the largest proportionate increase of foreign-born in the decade, 31.7 per cent. By the 1920 census, the foreign-born white population consisted of 47,217 Germans, 14,652 Russians, 27,724 Italians, 15,438 Czecho-Slovaks, and 259,007 Mexicans.

Concerning the church.—The measure of Methodist Episcopal work throughout the West South Central states must be more in terms of goals and service than in statistical record, if it is to be correctly made. While its strength is not great, a spirit of achievement has permeated the church in this region, with the result that rapid progress is being made. Much of it lies within the Wichita Area, which led all the areas in Methodism in 1922 in net increase in membership. These states as a whole are still largely home missionary territory. The Methodist Episcopal work is almost evenly distributed between the whites and the Negroes. The white work is largely centered in Oklahoma, which is more of a western state than a southern, and in the cities of Texas. The Negro work is scattered through all the states, but is largely developed in Louisiana. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is very strong throughout these states, but competition has been reduced to a minimum, and fraternal relations are growing.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has 122,263 members here, of whom 58,482 are white English-speaking, and 57,728 Negro, 4,212 German and 1,574 Scandinavian; the Sunday-school enrolment is 117,148, of which 72,408 are white English-speaking, 37,616 Negro, 5,688 German and 1,229 Scandinavian; 1,227 churches, of which 435 are white English-speaking, 724 Negro, 53 German and 12 Scandinavian. The net value of churches and parsonages is $6,485,206, while the total paid for local expenses was $1,825,371. Benevolences were $456,280, and the total for all purposes, $2,281,651, or $18.66 per capita.

PROBLEMS OF THE FIELD

The rural situation.—No single designation can cover the rural situation of the West South Central states, so varied are the conditions and occupations. Agriculture has a wide meaning and can be specifically applied only in a geographical sense. In the cotton belt where thousands of Negroes are employed, the problem, as universally elsewhere throughout the South, is one of overcoming poverty, ignorance, superstition and discouragement. Among the white people, it is establishing a modern church program, promoting a better racial feeling, and setting higher educational standards.

In the timber regions will be found the usual condition of spiritual deprivation among the lumberjacks. Many thousands of men, away from families or without family ties, are here employed, under conditions that tend to destroy both soul and body. The attention of the church has been directed of late years to the necessity for religious work in the great forest regions of the north and northwest. The south should not be forgotten.

The vast farming sections of the western portion of the division range all the way from thickly settled, grain-raising regions, with modern homes and splendid equipment, to the old-time cattle ranches. The problems of the former are the same as have been emphasized before: the adaptation of the open country and village church to the changing communities, and the inauguration of a seven-day social and religious ministry to reach the entire neighborhood; while the problem of the latter is that of the frontier, where travel is often over dim trails through cattle pastures, between ranch houses often twenty miles apart, an isolation and a loneliness which makes the missionary pastor a welcome visitor. He is the circuit-rider of the new day, travelling by automobile instead of in the saddle and rendering just as vital an influence for the Kingdom as did his forebears in the long ago.

The oil fields.—The famous "gold rushes" of by-gone days to California, to Cripple Creek, Colorado, and to Death Valley, produced some of the great home missionary enterprises of the early day. Somewhat similar, with part of the "scenic effects" of six-shooters, open gambling and prostitution, and frequent killings gone, have been the oil rushes to Oklahoma and Texas, where "flowing gold" has been discovered in unparalleled quantities.

The discovery of an oil pool means a population influx over night, with new towns laid out, drilling outfits imported, and a tremendous industry launched in a twinkling. With the drillers and promoters come the oil camp-followers of every description. "Tent cities" often are the result, and lax moral conditions and religious indifference create a tremendous missionary problem. This situation, now largely passed in Oklahoma and Texas because the oil industry is now in the stage of extension of old fields rather than the discovery of new ones, has been followed by a well-defined, stabilized industry, engaging the efforts of large numbers of people. They form a heterogeneous group. A splendid opportunity awaits the church to develop a community church work in the oil centers.

Foreign-speaking residents.—The scattered colonies of the Germans, Russians and Czecho-Slovaks throughout the rural regions of the West South Central states principally in Oklahoma and Texas, the Italians in the industrial centers and the French in the old south present a definite missionary problem. Large contingents of Germans emigrated to Texas in 1848, and whole counties were given over to them by the government. They transformed the wilderness into a rich agricultural section, throughout large portions of which the Methodist Episcopal Church is giving the only religious ministry to the people.

Little is known in the church at large of the religious situation among the French settlements of Louisiana. They are not catalogued among the foreign born, as they are descendants of old French settlers. But like the Canadian French, they are very tenacious of their language and customs, and in actuality remain more of a foreign problem than many of the newer colonies of foreign-born. An illuminating picture of them is given in a chronicle of missionary work in Basile, Louisiana.

A French romance.—“In 1911 the first sermon was preached in the saw-mill. So faithfully did the first pastor live and preach the gospel and with such telling effect that the wrath of the roughs of the community was stirred and they upon one occasion shot at him while he was preaching. The church was built in 1912.

“In Basile we are in the heart of the Evangeline country. In the Evangeline Parish there are 28,000 people, 95 per cent of whom are of French descent; 85 per cent of those over 21 years of age cannot read or write; 50 per cent of those of school age cannot do so, while 55 per cent of those of school age do not attend school.

“The descendants of the first Acadians are nominally Roman Catholic. The great majority, however, are so little in sympathy with their church and so loosely tied to it in practice as to be practically without church affiliation. Of the 28,000 people 90 per cent are nominally Catholic, yet there are only four Roman Catholic churches in the parish which is forty miles long and thirty miles wide.

“The church secured, the problem of the school remained. An endeavor was made to secure a high school, but it was met by open and determined opposition of the Catholic priest. The school did not materialize. Later twelve acres of land were purchased and a church school was planned. When the Catholic priest saw that a church school was likely to come to his community, he and neighboring priests at once endeavored to hinder the project. Many of the French, however, stood loyally by when they believed it would bring new opportunity to their children. A building was erected and in September, 1922, the first Methodist school for the French in America became a fact. The Woman's Home Missionary Society has undertaken the part of the project which will develop into an industrial home for French-American girls."

These students from the Agricultural and Mechanical College, Stillwater, Oklahoma, attend the Methodist Sunday school

The Methodist Episcopal work among them is now carried on at three churches and two school houses as well as in connection with the college.

Among the Mexicans.—One of the tremendous migrations to America to which comparatively little attention has been paid in the past ten years has been that of the Mexicans across the southern border. The church and the nation think of the foreign-speaking problem in terms of southern Europeans principally, yet this influx of more than a million aliens creates a Spanish-speaking problem which places a monumental missionary burden on the church. Not only is it a missionary problem in terms of humanity, but also one in terms of international relations. The prejudice and hatred aroused by selfish jingoism make it especially urgent that the church, by wise home and foreign missions, should demonstrate that neighborliness is possible among the nations.

The movement of the Mexicans into America has been largely industrial. Railroads particularly have brought them in by the thousands to work in construction camps and on right-of-ways. Hundreds of towns in Oklahoma and Texas, increasing as the southern border is approached, have their Mexican colonies, much the same as industrial towns and cities of the east have their foreign-speaking sections. In El Paso, out of a population of 78,000 there are 45,000 Mexicans. San Antonio has many thousands, also. They engage in the commonest of labor. Illiteracy, ignorance, poverty, superstition, and low moral standards are common among them. They fall an easy prey to disease. They have been exploited in many ways, and only rarely has any effort, aside from the missionary activity of the church, been made to understand or reach them. They have lived and been treated as a people inferior and apart—the "greasers." Yet they are essentially spiritual by nature, and responsive to an appeal by those in whom they have confidence. The success of the Methodist work in Mexico is a witness to that fact, as well as in specific communities in the United States, although only a few of these are in this division. With their quarter million population in the West South Central states, they form a community which the church must heed.

A Centenary task begun but not finished—An uncompleted Negro church

The cities.—An important feature of the West South Central states is its rapidly growing cities, especially in Oklahoma and Texas. The expansion of the oil industry and other elements of commerce have caused a tremendous influx of northern capital and personnel. New Orleans, one of the oldest cities of the nation, is the metropolis of the area, with 387,219 people, its growth being but 14.2 per cent during the decade. It is also the most cosmopolitan city of the southland, containing about 110,000 Negroes, an increase of 25 per cent in ten years, most of them coming from the rural sections. There are also about 40,000 people of foreign birth, chiefly Italian, German, French, Spanish and Jewish, drawn mostly to it as a port.

The four largest cities of Texas, San Antonio with 161,379 people, Dallas with 158,976, Houston with 138,276, and Fort Worth with 106,482, increased during the decade 67, 72.6, 75.5, and 45.2 per cent respectively. Oklahoma City, with 91,295 people, is the largest in Oklahoma. Tulsa, in the heart of the oil field, advanced from 18,182 in 1910 to 72,075 in 1920, a gain of 296.4 per cent, making it one of the fastest growing cities in America. To keep pace with the new neighborhoods as they develop and to adapt the established churches' programs to the changing city needs is the task of the church.

The church in the field.—This story of a reborn village church and community is the story of twentieth century home missions as it is at work in numerous sections of the middle west, and as it will be in greater measure in the future, if the progress demanded of the church is maintained.

A few years ago, Roosevelt, Oklahoma, was a typical rural village of 600 people, with four feeble churches struggling in wasteful competition. Assigned to the Methodist Episcopal church was a formerly successful business man who had given up his work to become a country preacher. With a salary of $400 a year and seven children in his family, there was but one thing to do. He rented a farm and raised cotton to make ends meet, preaching on Sundays and doing his parish calling in between times. Hard work and discouragement did not daunt him, however, and he went straight ahead toward the goal which he had set up, the establishment of a community center.

A pastor at work.—He organized the boys and girls of the town, irrespective of denomination, into troupes of Boy Scouts and Camp Fire Girls. For the boys he built an attractive club house across from the parsonage. He laid the first concrete sidewalk, a stretch of 360 feet from the main street to the church. He worked successfully to have a course in domestic science added to the curriculum of grade and high schools. He organized a cemetery improvement association which cleared the cemetery of weeds and built a fence around it to keep out the live stock. And he brought about the construction of three and a half miles of graded road from Roosevelt to the village of Cold Springs in the Wichita Mountains. Going into Cold Springs which was without religious advantages, he held a revival that so stirred up things that a bootlegging gang was routed whose leader became one of the promoters of the $2,500 chapel which was later built.

The result is that a $32,000 community house was erected, and it and the church have become the center of the life of the people. Lectures, school exercises, women's meetings, farmers' institutes, and other educational and social activities are held there. The church has become an essential part of the community and the spiritual and moral value of the service rendered is apparent in many ways.

Other active churches.—A night school for the benefit of those who must work to support dependents is one of the features of the community service of the Medford, Oklahoma, Methodist Episcopal Church. There is also a junior congregation, composed of boys and girls eight to fifteen years of age, pledged to attend worship. The church already has two of its young women members as missionaries in India and has twelve life service recruits now in preparation in high school and college. The building burned early in 1922, but has been replaced by a larger structure with good Sunday-school equipment and quarters for community work, in co-operation with the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension.

Jasper, Arkansas, is twenty-two miles inland from the railroad. The Methodist Episcopal Church has the leadership of the whole county. Avery's Chapel, in Hemstead County, Arkansas, is forty miles from the nearest Methodist Episcopal Church, and is supplied by the pastor at Amity, he driving that distance once per month and being compelled to cross two treacherous rivers in the journey. St. Joe, Everton Circuit, Arkansas, is a town of 500 people with no church. This is a type of critical situation where we have the sole responsibility and which has always been accepted as a challenge to missionary endeavor. Everton Circuit, Arkansas, covers an area of 200 square miles and is our sole responsibility. Center Valley, in the same district, covering a similar area, has produced twenty ministers in the past fifty years. It still needs aid like the others to keep trained men in the field until a strong modern program can be developed.

In the cities.—The cities of the south have been largely pre-empted by the southern branches of the various denominations.

Methodist tabernacle in the heart of Fort Worth, Texas

Yet in nearly all of them the Methodist Episcopal Church is represented by churches which are serving communities which need their ministry. The steady influx of people from the north enhances the opportunity presented.

A survey in 1922 revealed a rapidly growing unchurched section of Oklahoma City, where there was a large number of Methodist families. The need of a new church was recognized, but it seemed unwise to build an insignificant frame structure out of keeping in appearance with the homes and public buildings of the section. Through the aid of the City Union and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension the first unit of a good community church plant was erected.

In San Antonio, the largest boys' program of any church in the city is maintained by the new Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church in an impressive new building, modern in every respect and complete for meeting community needs in the heart of the residential section. It maintains weekly movies, a kindergarten and gymnasium classes.

Haven Methodist Episcopal Church at Hot Springs, Arkansas, is another modern church adapted to its community. First Church, located in the heart of the city, has an ambitious program of community service.

West Tulsa, Oklahoma, is a purely industrial community of 5,000 people and forms the parish of our church. The congregation was enabled to move from an inadequate structure to their new plant and Sunday-school classes that met on a vacant lot are now sheltered. An oil refinery donated native stone which was hauled free by the street car company. The refinery also gave $4,000 for the new church, recognizing its value to the community. The church and community house are planned to meet every need of the neighborhood. Room is provided for the auditorium and Sunday school, for a social hall, and for an athletic and recreational program.

Among the Negroes.—The heart of the Methodist Episcopal Church has ever been quickened to their appeal, and their steady progress toward better things materially, socially and spiritually, can in substantial part be attributed to the missionary work of our great church.

Bishop Robert E. Jones has summed it up in this wise:

"The Methodist Episcopal Church is in the forefront of this process of Americanization among ten millions of native-born black Americans. We are building churches and school houses, hospitals, old folks' homes and orphan asylums. We are educating doctors, lawyers, teachers and preachers. We are lending our support to the development of a leadership found in commercial life, in politics, in literature, in art, in music, in agriculture, in amusement, in education and in religion.

"At the same time, that assistance has been meager when placed against the background of monumental need. In whole districts of the South are to be found Negro churches which are nothing more than hovels. Here and there are being erected modern buildings, however, and equipped with a trained leadership. The results are remarkable and demonstrate beyond question that the solution lies in the energetic and intelligent promotion of such a program."

In New Orleans.—As a "city of the world," where many races and nationalities meet and commingle, it is natural that the Negro, along with other groups, should have greater freedom and opportunity of self-expression in New Orleans than in any other city of the South. Here there is less "consciousness of kind" and hence less race prejudice and discrimination against color. A home mission writer has said:

"The Negroes in New Orleans enjoy the distinction of working in practically every trade; they are bricklayers, carpenters, painters, mechanics, machinists, and they control the stevedore and longshore work. Industrially and socially, the Negro is coming into his own. The Negro owns and controls three large insurance companies in the city; the Unity Life Insurance Company (Negro) employs twenty-five people, does a business of $500,000 annually, and owns property valued at $700,000. The 'Crescent City Park' is a great pleasure center owned and controlled by Negroes; its bouts and athletic sports draw many thousands to the city. The Negro Pythians own an eight-story building valued at $300,000, housing a fine modern Negro theater. The Odd Fellows, the Masons and the Eastern Stars care for fraternal activities and the Wheatley Club is a powerful political-social organization.

"There is a Negro Young Men's Christian Association with Bishop Robert E. Jones as president, two Negro branches of the Public Library and three public parks exclusively for Negroes. There are nine separate elementary schools and one high school for Negro young people. Graduates of the latter can teach in the state without further examination.

Negro churches.—"The Negro churches in New Orleans have a total attendance of about 35,000 on the average Sunday, leaving 75,000 not attending regularly. The seating capacity of all Negro churches is only 65,000, leaving 45,000 unprovided for.

"Forty-five thousand Negroes are listed as members of Negro Catholic churches in New Orleans, due, doubtless, to the French and Spanish Catholic influences and traditions. The Roman Catholic Church has nine churches for Negroes, supplied by white priests. There is one Negro nunnery with about sixty sisters, and Xavier University with about 600 students. There are 16 Methodist Episcopal, 5 African Methodist, 2 Colored Methodist, 3 Presbyterian, 2 Episcopal, 3 Holiness, 4 Congregational, 1 Christian Science and 74 Baptist churches."

First Methodist church, New Orleans, has plans under way for a new building, five stories high, partly devoted to business offices and stores, and the rest auditorium, assembly rooms, kindergarten, day nursery, rest rooms, club rooms, gymnasium and other recreational facilities. It has a membership of 900 Negroes, and is known as a "man's church" because of the large number of men who worship in it. Four hundred of the 900 members are men, and two-thirds of the average congregation are men.

One of the best equipped institutional churches among the Negroes—

In a heavily populated Negro neighborhood, the former Franklin Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church of the Southern German conference sold its church, social center building and parsonage at a reduced figure to the Negroes. The German congregation had been offered $20,000 by a motion picture concern but turned it down for a $12,000 offer from the Negroes, underwritten by the local Negro City Society and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension. A pastor and two workers make ministry of the church effective every day in the week. Welfare work, kindergarten, day school, night school, employment bureau, medical clinic, dental clinic, cafeteria and boys' work offer the only church welfare ministry for Negroes in this parish of thirty-six blocks.

Home mission aid enabled Grace Church to purchase an old building of another denomination and to carry on an unusual and helpful work among young Negroes in the downtown section. Three-fourths of its average congregations are boys and young men thirteen to twenty-four years of age. Mt. Zion Church, with a fine new building, in a thickly populated Negro section, is crowded continuously with week-day activities. It has a school, kindergarten, playground and cafeteria.

Church and people, Cleveland, Oklahoma

A number of other Negro Methodist Episcopal churches in New Orleans are gradually adjusting their organization and programs to meet the new demands made upon them. The one-day-a-week church is becoming the seven-day-a-week church with its varied program of worship, instruction, recreation and social welfare. Trinity Church, for example, has broadened its scope to include kindergarten, classes in teacher training, classes in domestic arts and sciences. Wesley Church, the oldest Negro church of the Methodist denomination, founded in 1853, maintains a playground, a cafeteria, a social center, and Wesleyan Hall for club meetings. Two thousand persons make Wesley their church and social and recreational home.

But among some of the others the need is distressing. Haven Chapel, built before the Civil War, is held together by log chains, yet it serves as the only church in the midst of 5,000 Negroes, most of whom are employed as stevedores and in shipyards. Scott Chinn Church, crowded into a bad location, in the midst of 14,000 Negroes, sorely needs a modern building.

Other Negro churches.—At Lake Charles, Louisiana, in the center of a large industrial and agricultural section, is located one of the best Negro churches in the South. The town draws many hundreds of Negroes from surrounding communities because of its excellent school facilities. The congregation, determined to keep apace, secured help from the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension and built a community church, equipped with auditorium, class rooms, gymnasium, social hall and reading room. It is the largest church building in the city and has resulted in an improvement of moral conditions and a greater tolerance from the white people toward their Negro brethren.

Perhaps the finest Negro church building, in the erection of which the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has co-operated, is St. Paul's Church at San Antonio, Texas. Fully equipped for religious, educational and community work, it is the Christian center to which thousands of Negroes come seven days in the week.

THE FIELD OF EDUCATION

Colleges and student work.—Oklahoma City College is Methodism's major educational institution for its white constituency in the West South Central states. A successful financial campaign has enabled it to erect new buildings and establish a substantial endowment fund.

Other schools are Texas Wesleyan College at Austin, Blinn Memorial College at Brenham, Texas, and Port Arthur College at Port Arthur, Texas.

Negro educational institutions.—Four colleges are the contribution of the Methodist Episcopal Church to the cause of Negro education in the West South Central states.

Philander Smith.—Between 400 and 500 students are enrolled in Philander Smith College at Little Rock, Arkansas. The moral and religious atmosphere of the institution is strong.

Gilbert College.—At New Orleans, Gilbert College has an enrolment of approximately 600 and provides pre-medical and teachers' college courses as well as the usual academic work.

Samuel Huston College is located at Austin, Texas.

Wiley.—At Marshall, Texas, will be found Wiley University, one of our most important institutions of Negro education. It is said that "the results of Wiley's fifty years as a lighthouse to a whole race are to be found in the professional and business channels of every southern state and of nearly every southern city of importance. Wiley's graduates are among the leaders of their race not only in Texas but throughout the whole cotton belt. From Wiley the Texas Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church secure the majority of their pastors; from Wiley the Meharry Medical Colleges get more of their students than from any other institution under the Board of Education for Negroes; from Wiley there go out trained teachers of Negro youth, licensed, without further examination, to instruct in the schools of Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, and Arizona."

Woman's Home Missions.—Where the need is greatest there the work of the Woman's Home Missionary Society will be found in its greatest abundance. In New Orleans, the Italian Mission is supported by the Society. A kindergarten and a visiting nurse are maintained on the staff.

At the Rose Gregory Houchen Settlement in El Paso, Texas, located in the heart of a Mexican settlement, a great response is being won among these people from beyond the southern border of our country. Classes in kindergarten, sewing, cooking, millinery, gymnastics, camp-fire work, kitchen-garden, basketry, and industrial arts are conducted, and there are clubs for mothers, and for boys and girls.

Distressing conditions of poverty, disease, and ignorance are combatted by the settlement, and headway is being made for better things for the colony in which the settlement is located.

At Whiteagle, Oklahoma, is located the Ponca Mission, carrying on a religious and educational work among the North American Indians, especially for the children. There are also numerous Negro schools, orphanages, missions and industrial homes, among them the Sager-Brown Orphanage for Negro Children at Baldwin, Louisiana, with sixty children, and the King Industrial Home for girls, conducted in connection with Wiley University, teaching dress-making, domestic science and normal courses.

Bible distribution. — Scriptures in twenty-eight languages were distributed throughout the region in 1922 by the Southwestern Agency of the American Bible Society, located at Dallas, Texas. Practically 100,000 Bibles and Bible portions are placed in homes and in the hands of individuals in this section yearly. A noteworthy feature is the changing attitude toward the Bible by the French and Creole population centering in New Orleans. A veteran colporteur there asserts that never has he had such a wel-

The service of philanthropy.—New Orleans is the headquarters of two of the four hospitals and homes of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the West South Central states. One is the Lafon Home for the Aged, caring for fifty Negro men and women past sixty years of age.

The Flint-Goodridge Hospital and Nurse Training School, also Negro, is one of the best hospitals of the city. It has fifty-six beds, and its free clinic ministered to more than 6,000 people last year. It specializes in the training of young Negro women for the nursing profession. Its aim is a new hospital of 375 beds where semi-tropical diseases may be studied and treated scientifically, and where training may be given a hundred nurses at a time.

THE MISSIONARY NEEDS

There are areas of wealth and of poverty in the West South Central states, and even in the trail of wealth there go those who are in need of the ministry of the church. Whether one thinks in terms of the poverty-stricken Negroes of the poorer farming regions, the scattered plainsmen, the loggers, the miners, the spiritually needy of city or country, one feels that the Methodist Episcopal Church has just begun its work. Some of the typical needs are as follows:

A community house in a section of 17,000 French people without any vital connection with any church, and 2,000 children out of school.

A church building and community center in town with 2,800 Negroes and no church building. Negroes living in one and two-room houses, one-half of them illiterate, and 450 out of 700 children not in school. Larger influx expected because of new industries.

Church in Negro parish of 2,000 in city of 38,000 people.

Building to replace church destroyed by flood, many members' homes also destroyed.

Ten churches in unchurched German communities in one Methodist district.

Remodel building into community center in Negro community of 5,000 people.

New church at state university center, where there are 750 Methodist students.

Removal of mortgage from church where Negro farmers have put up their homes as collateral against foreclosure.

Aid needed for church almost bankrupt on account of having been caught in war-time conditions while building.

Completion of church for Negroes now worshipping in unfinished basement.

New church to replace one destroyed by fire.
Supplement salaries in badly stricken rural territory.

Church enclosed but not completed. Negro congregation oppressed by lumber company demanding eight per cent interest quarterly on unpaid bill.

Aid to replacing tumbled down church building and one-room shack used for parsonage after district was hit by flood.

Church adjoining a state university for Negroes.

Building for new Methodist Episcopal Church developed out of a Union Sunday school.

Rebuild a Negro church destroyed during race riot.

Opportunity calls.—In many ways the West South Central states form one of the newer communities of the nation. It is true they have long been settled but they have remained largely undeveloped. A new era has begun, and scientific agriculture and industry are marching hand in hand in the making of a new empire. The church must go along with that development, if it would win the millions to Christ.

If people only knew the need of home missions, we would not have to see these churches which we try to put in the new centers struggle and languish as they do.

"BROTHER VAN"

MOUNTAIN STATES

THE FRONTIER

Out where the West begins.—In the land where towering, snow-capped mountains stand guard over rolling prairies; where fertile valleys nestle among the hills; where dug-outs still are dwelling places, and where the gold prospector occasionally goes forth with his pack; where wild game range the wild, and where deserts greet with their mirages; where gardens and orchards and grain fields beckon and picturesque cities welcome the stranger; where gold mines and coal camps are companions of refineries and steel mills; where dwell the pioneer settler and the millionaire—that is the frontier of today. The heart of it is the Rocky Mountain region.

Vast stretches of primeval prairies and forests greet the nature lover. Majestic mountains, lakes and meadows, the incomparable Grand Canyon and Royal Gorge, make the appeal of beauty. Rich, undeveloped ore regions, unsettled homestead lands, extensive irrigation projects, and other endless economic opportunities are the magnet for new dwellers, making it the fastest growing division, with the exception of the Pacific states, of the nation.

The land and the people.—The seeker after "elbow room" need feel no crowding here. In an area whose geographical extent staggers the imagination, live only 3,336,101 people, so scattered as a whole that no country so sparsely settled is to be found in either Europe or South America, save Bolivia and the Guianas. The average is only 3.9 persons per square mile, while the average for the nation at large is 35.5 persons.

The Mountain states form one of the major rural sections of the country, the rural population totalling 2,121,121 people, or 63.6 per cent of the whole, while the urban population is 1,214,980, or 36.4 per cent. The variation in percentages in thirty years has been slight, in 1890 the rural being 70.7 and the urban 29.3. The foreign-born total 453,225 and the Negroes 30,801. The Negro increase for the decade of 1910-20 was 43.5 per cent. Illiterates number 132,659 or 5.2 per cent. Colorado is the largest in population, with 939,629 inhabitants and Nevada the smallest, with 77,407.

Methodism today.— This mountain, plateau and valley land of enchantment and potential riches, passed by in the rush to the Pacific for gold, is still, in the main, a vast missionary territory. Here are some older cities with great churches, and some prosperous towns and villages and thickly settled countryside where there is a stable educational, social and church life. But in the main, these states are still in the making.

In such a situation, the measure of the church is more in its potentialities than actualities, more in the way it is headed and the progress it is making than in the exact position on the road. In that light, the statistics of the Methodist Episcopal Church for the Mountain states assume importance. The membership is 84,960, of which 83,041 are white English-speaking; the Sunday-school enrolment is 123,099, of which 120,502 are white, English-speaking. There are 12,402 Senior Epworth Leaguers and 5,792 Juniors. The eighteen Latin churches, mostly Spanish-speaking, have enrolled 1,036 members.

Lewiston, Idaho

The net value of all Methodist churches and parsonages in the division is $6,394,708, and the total local expenses for 1922 were $1,762,802. Benevolences were $423,086, while the total paid for all purposes was $2,185,888, with a per capita giving of $25.73 for the year. The church also has here five institutions of higher education, maintains student work at twelve non-Methodist institutions, and has fourteen hospitals and homes. Summer schools and institutes of various types are fifteen in number.

Isolated areas.— In Wyoming, Colorado and New Mexico will be found large cattle ranches where the flavor of the old west still lingers, and where the cowboy is yet a living figure. Ranch houses are planted in the shelter of mountains or in the valleys where there are water and wood, or out on the vast plateaus. The life is an isolated one, and the work of the missionary is pioneering.

Similarly, isolation is the primary problem of missionary work on the sheep and cattle ranches of Idaho and in the arid sections of Utah, Nevada and Arizona, and to a lesser degree in the "dry farming" regions and in the homestead areas of the different states.

The irrigated regions.— Those who have not journeyed through the west and seen the marvelous expansion of irrigation projects turning deserts and valleys into fertile gardens cannot comprehend the significance of this movement to agriculture and to the nation at large. Lands which have been so arid that only cactus would grow have, under the magic of water, turned into fertile fields of magnificent harvest. Every irrigation project opened up means the influx of new families, the settling up of farms and the opening of towns. They become farming communities of more than ordinary population, because heavy production and intensive care makes the small farm of ten to one hundred acres the average, rather than the traditional "quarter" or "half", 160 or 320 acres, of the middle west.

Settlers' investment for land and water rights ties them up for a number of years. It amounts to a mortgage on their future. In addition, there are improvements to be made, such as schools, public buildings, good roads and the like, most of which come in terms of taxes and are not a matter of choice. Missionary help is imperative, therefore, for the founding of missions and the development of churches.

The mining communities.—The mining camp has ever been a missionary challenge to the church. Two-thirds of the industrial values of Montana are produced in its mining, copper smelting and refining processes. Copper mines in Arizona are among the greatest in the world. Gold, silver, lead and zinc are also produced. Colorado is second among the states in the production of gold. It also has immense coal and silver mines. Oil production runs high in Wyoming, its oil fields producing missionary problems much similar to the mining camps. It also has extensive coal and copper production. Mineral resources are varied in Utah, ranging from gold to zinc, likewise in Nevada, third in rank in silver production. Idaho is second in lead and sixth in zinc production. New Mexico is a coal producing center.

The Spanish-speaking groups.—New Mexico and Arizona, and a section of Colorado form the center of the territory which the 1,000,000 Spanish-speaking people inhabit. Sweeping across from southern and western Texas to southern California and the Pacific shores, in many sections they comprise the majority of the people, thus forming one of the great home missionary opportunities.

This vast foreign-speaking group is divided into two distinct classes. The one is native-born and the other is the Mexican refugee and immigrant. The native-born of Spanish origin are descendant, through many generations back, from the Spanish colonists who settled the land and claimed it for their own. Many of them, of proud Castilian blood, are conscious of their lineage and maintain the traditions of language, custom and caste. They look at the coming in of the native American as the invasion of a foreigner. The historic towns of Santa Fe and Tucson, two of the oldest in the western hemisphere, typify in their architecture and social cleavages, this historic, Spanish element in American life.

The other Spanish-speaking group is composed of the hordes of Mexicans who have migrated to the United States, some as political refugees, others to become laborers in the mines, on railroad construction jobs, on irrigation projects, in industries and on the farms. Social conditions among them are miserable. Disease, destitution and death are rampant among them.

Other nationalities.—Large numbers of Italians, Polish, Czecho-Slovaks, Lithuanians and Russians are to be found in the mining camps, especially of southern Colorado, northern New Mexico, and Montana. In the "open camps" especially, miserable housing conditions are to be found, while in the "closed camps" friction and labor unrest are often the rule. Japanese are in Colorado, Utah and Idaho, while most of the immigration in Utah is English and Scandinavian, drawn by Mormon enticements.

The Mormon problem.—Our best authority on Mormonism has stated:

"Mormons compose more than two-thirds of Utah's 450,000 people. Idaho is next with about 100,000. They keep about 1,800 missionaries in the field, but their propaganda cannot be called successful. The number of conversions on the outside is about 7,000 a year, while the net increase of the whole church is about 16,000 a year. The movement of people from the East and from foreign countries as a result of Mormon missionary effort is less than formerly because there is no longer the inducement of free land. The expansion of Mormonism is by colonization rather than by conversion. For that reason the church encourages the movement of families to neighboring states. Their missionary efforts are really unsuccessful because their doctrine makes no appeal to intelligent religious people."

Summing up.—The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension gathers up the frontier situation in these words:

"The Frontier is a field with diversity of conditions and challenging opportunities and needs. The simple frontier of the past is no more...The problem of the church is a much changed one....Predominant now is the task of making the church function where it has been planted in the past and establishing it effectively in communities being born full grown in a day."

In New Mexico.—In the mountains of northern New Mexico a missionary pastor is toiling in a parish embracing 2,000 square miles. Rangers, farmers, loggers and miners are among the little groups, called congregations, which gather in the bunkhouses, the miners' shacks, and occasionally the 'dobe huts in which he preaches the Gospel. At the center of his parish is the town of Cimarron, where a comfortable parsonage has been secured, a new church building erected and a seven-day-a-week program put on. The town ministry might occupy all his time, but his is the heart that goes out into the hills.

One of his charges, the Red River school house, is forty-five miles away and to reach it he must travel over rough mountain roads, usually in the saddle. Altogether his parish includes "four agricultural communities, three mining camps, one lumber camp, one important mixed community, and uncounted ranchers, settlers, cowboys, mining prospectors and others, hidden away in some of the most beautiful mountains, canyons and fertile valleys which the mind can picture."

A Bishop speaks.—Stirring events on the frontier are indicated in the following words of Bishop Burns:

"The Helena Area, consisting of North Dakota, Montana, Idaho, and eastern Oregon, representing enormous reaches of territory, equivalent to a journey from New York to Minneapolis, is the largest continuous area in American Methodism. It consists of 316,000 square miles. There are 1,050 preaching places with 404 men manning these great circuits, the largest single parish in America. For heroism, sacrifice, and courage, these college-bred ministers and their cultured wives are unequalled. It is no wonder that under their leadership the Helena area in per capita giving is near the lead in the church.

"In North Montana through the drought of seven years no man has abandoned his task, while some of our preachers have lived on potatoes and stewed hearts of the Canadian thistle and have kept the fidelity of the faith in the missionary gifts. Out of their poverty and need, the Glacier Park district, covering the whole of North Montana, has presented the remarkable achievement of 112 per cent in missionary giving. With seven to fourteen-point circuits, these hardy, heroic men travel whole counties in their unwashed Fords, building a Christian empire in the Northwest."

In one district in northern Montana are twenty-four preachers, seventeen of them college and seminary graduates. But there is only one good church building in the district. One of the men has twelve preaching places and nine Sunday schools on his charge and not a dollar's worth of church property. In another section there are sixty-five preaching points and not a church building.

Events at Roundup.—Roundup, Montana, is a typical frontier town of 6,000 or 7,000 people in a territory changing from sheep and cattle-raising to farming and mining. Coal lies nearby and oil fields are not far away. The population is polyglot. In the old box-shaped church the Methodist people worked and worshipped for years. Then came the need for a new building. The people dug the basement and put the building materials on the ground for the new church. In the old building, without a kitchen, the Ladies' Aid Society in one year made $1,200 for the new enterprise. The new church, located on a corner which eighty-five per cent of the town people pass on their way to the business center, was designed by the Bureau of Architecture to serve the community. It contains a gymnasium, dining hall, club rooms, and social center quarters and is open every day. Helpers in the construction were two councilmen, clerks and miners. The life of the entire community is being influenced constructively by this Methodist church, which the town thinks of in terms of a part of itself.

"Land office business."—At Emmett, Idaho, home mission help has resulted in a thoroughly remodelled church plant, including the addition of a gallery, a gymnasium and Sunday-school and social facilities. The Buhl, Idaho, congregation is worshipping in the basement of an unfinished building, in which a Sunday school of over 300 members must be quartered. After a recent revival more than 100 members were added to the church.

Eighteen states and three foreign countries are represented in the constituency of 600 people of the Wheatland, Wyoming, Methodist Church. Yet it stands as the commander of a small empire, because the nearest community of any considerable size to the south is Cheyenne, sixty miles away. The nearest church to the north is Douglas, fifty-eight miles distant. To the east fifty-two miles is Torrington, while to the west the vast plains stretch eighty-eight miles to Laramie. The church has members living twenty-six miles away in the hills. In 1922, the Wheatland church had a property value of $31,000, a membership of 325, an auditorium seating 750 and a Sunday-school provision for 600. It is a good illustration of the fruits of home missions.

In mining camps.—Out in Utah nature has cut a gorge through the hills and man has planted an industry in it. The result is Bingham Canyon, one of America's most interesting spots. One street, Main street, runs like a snake's trail for miles up and down the length of the canyon, while stores, schools, houses, and mine dumps intermingle up and down it and about the mountain sides. Rich copper mines are the one industry.

Here on the one street live 13,000 people of eighteen different nationalities. There is little opportunity for normal life such as is found in better developed communities of the East. Three years ago our Methodist work amounted to practically nothing. Then the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension built a new church and put in trained leadership. Our missionaries are now putting on an all-round program under the auspices of the church. They have a kindergarten with an enrolment of eighty-five children of Mormon and Catholic families as well as Protestant; clubs for children in the primary department, industrial classes for boys and girls, girl pioneers and boy and girl scouts. The pastor organized a Father and Son Club, and a prayer band of twenty-six boys who met before school every day for three months.

A Wyoming coal town.—Ten thousand people of thirty different nationalities live in Rock Springs, Wyoming, one of the state's largest coal producing centers. The Methodist Episcopal Church is housed in a small building with an auditorium 24x50 feet and a smaller room 9x24 adjoining. The only other quarters were a basement. But in spite of such inadequate equipment, there are remarkable results, especially among the boys of great coal camp.

Now over 200 boys of twenty different nationalities are enrolled in the activities of the church. For the girls there are Camp Fire and Blue Bird organizations, Sewing Club, and Kitchen Garden Club.

Achievements in Denver.—In Denver one of the most progressive city programs in Methodism has been organized and is in successful operation. The identity of the Denver District with the city environs makes possible a reinforced organization and greater efficiency. The program is one inclusive of missionary expansion, Christian education and social service. It seeks not only to provide more and better churches, but also to adapt each church to the specific needs of its community, to reoccupy abandoned fields and to anticipate future growth. It is a comprehensive city program, rather than stereotyped, haphazard, unrelated church activity.

Ten years ago the Denver District had a total membership of 6,372. The churches now report a total membership of 10,266, exclusive of probationers or non-resident members. The property values ten years ago were $568,500. Now they are $980,850. This increase in property values is represented in seven new church buildings, eleven community houses and Sunday-school buildings, four new strategic sites upon which churches will be built, and eleven new parsonages.

The giving to disciplinary benevolences has increased from $21,965 to $62,105. The district now has twenty-seven churches, thirteen of which are conducting a full seven-day-a-week program of social and educational activities. More than 60,000 persons pass through these churches each month and are touched by the religious influences of these activities. All of these thirteen churches have a paid staff of one or more members in addition to the pastor.

Eight churches are now provided with full gymnasium equipment for their recreational program, while five have improvised gymnasiums in remodelled space in older church buildings. Fifteen of the churches in the district last summer conducted daily vacation Bible schools from four weeks to two months in duration. One church is conducting a regular system of week-day religious education after school hours throughout the winter months. Eighteen of the churches are conducting some form of religious instruction and education by means of well-organized classes on one or more week-days.

In Pueblo.—In a city of great car shops, steel mills, smelting, refining, brick and tile works, the First Methodist Episcopal Church has a parish of 18,000 people. A splendid new church, where an adequate program for all classes of people in the parish, is under construction. Excellent contacts are being made with labor and foreign-speaking groups. Northern Avenue Church, located also in an industrial neighborhood, has wide opportunities for community service, but no equipment.

One of Methodism's oldest Italian missions is located in Pueblo, in a parish of 130 city blocks where dwell many thousands of Italians, Mexicans, Negroes, and Slavs. In spite of miserably inadequate equipment, the mission is doing a heroic nature. Missionary activity in the way of planting churches here and there, conducting preaching service and Sunday school, evangelism by the personal method and educational activity through schools and colleges—these form the first method. Varying success has been registered. Right leadership and proper equipment have made remarkable records possible in some places, notably Salt Lake City, while insufficiently supported effort elsewhere has meant a lack of results commensurate with the opportunity.

work of uplift and service. During the flood a few years ago, one of its buildings was entirely washed away, only one chair being salvaged. The people went bravely ahead in the remaining building. Now the pastor has listed more than 1,000 children who live within the parish and is reaching the community in a larger way through the ministry to them.

In Salt Lake City.—One of the fine Methodist Episcopal achievements in Utah has been the completion of Centenary Church in the south residential section of Salt Lake City. This gives a modern plant providing for social, recreational and religious educational work. The new Grace church erected last year on the west side of the city also is a modern plant with gymnasium, departmental accommodation for Sunday school, kitchen, parlors and scout rooms. First Church, starting with fifteen boys in a religious education program, now has more than one hundred enlisted. The Epworth League is strong, registering a weekly attendance of more than one hundred.

The miner's town.—In Butte, Methodism has six churches, only one of which is a good church building. The others are one-room buildings or basements. Butte has 7,000 Italians and 2,000 Greeks, and 60,000 people in its environs. Most of our effort is among the English-speaking.

In the Mormon stronghold.—Methodist work in Mormon territory, primarily Utah and Idaho, has been of a two-fold

The other method has been stated by an authority on Mormonism in this way:

"Our greatest work has been in forcing Mormonism to change its attitude toward evangelical truth. Three great results have followed evangelical effort in Utah and have more than justified our expenditures there:

1. Evangelical missionary activity forced the Mormon church to install a first-class public school system. When that system was installed the doom of old Mormonism was sealed. Their children afford a fertile field for evangelical effort.

2. Evangelical effort in Utah has forced the Mormon Church to change its attitude toward the United States government and become measurably patriotic.

3. Most important in recent years has been the gradual shifting of Mormon emphasis from non-Christian doctrines. The book of Mormon has been losing in importance, and the Bible has gained."

Spanish work.—The eighteen churches and more than 1,000 members indicate somewhat the achievements in this important Spanish-speaking work, a district of the New Mexico Conference. The real progress has been recent, however, as our church has been doing religious work for more than fifty years among Spanish people in New Mexico, Arizona and along the border, and has never until now had more than a few adobe huts as centers of worship. Increased benevolent giving has helped these people build fit places for worship.

The chief center of Methodist work among the Spanish-speaking people in the Mountain states is in Albuquerque, New Mexico. Here a substantial congregation has been gathered in spite of the lack of a building. Its services are held in the afternoons in the American church. Here also is located an institution for developing a leadership for the Spanish-speaking work, the Harwood School for Boys, formerly known as Albuquerque College.

A school for leaders.—Back in 1892, Dr. Thomas Harwood, early missionary to the Spanish-speaking people in the Southwest, embarked on the enterprise of a school. He started the Boys' Biblical and Industrial School at Socorro in 1892. It was later transferred to Albuquerque, a site secured and buildings erected. Each year witnesses an increased enrolment and some years students are turned away for lack of accommodations. The enrolment is in excess of one hundred. It has seventy acres of land, two school buildings and two residences, but equipment and quarters are both inadequate.

Courses are given in agriculture. There are literary societies, and a John Wesley Club, composed of a number of splendid young Spanish-Americans preparing for Christian missionary service. No greater enterprise of statesmanship in solving the Latin American problem is being fostered than this school.

For Spanish girls.—Two fine schools for Spanish-speaking girls are maintained in this territory by the Woman's Home Missionary Society. One is the Mary J. Platt Industrial School at Tucson, Arizona, where domestic science, home training and care, sewing and the cultural arts are taught. The other is the Harwood Industrial School at Albuquerque, New Mexico. Last year 120 were enrolled in this school.

Spanish congregations.—The most important and best equipped of the Spanish-speaking churches are at Douglas and Tucson. Half way between the center of Douglas and the international boundary line is located Centenary Church, largely built through Centenary aid. Forty per cent of the population of Douglas are Mexicans, between 6,000 and 7,000 of them. They make up ninety-five per cent of the membership of the church. In four years there were 140 conversions among them. The building is equipped for community work.

At Deming another splendid Spanish-speaking work is carried on. Las Cruces, New Mexico, has about 5,000 people, more than half of whom are Spanish-speaking. A small congregation is maintained there by the heroic efforts of the pastor, in spite of the most severe opposition. He also carries on work at Dona Ana. Lots are owned at Las Cruces, but the congregation has waited for years for help in securing a building. At Flagstaff, Arizona, is a Methodist Spanish-speaking congregation which worships in a Presbyterian building. Although it has no church of its own, it pays its benevolent quotas in full. Another of the preachers in the Spanish District has six preaching places.

Ministry to the Indians.—Indian Missions are maintained by the Methodist Episcopal Church in New Mexico, Montana, Nevada, and Arizona. At Browning, Montana, we have a growing and important piece of work among the 3,000 Black-foot Indians, 800 of whom are of school age. Of these 800, only 350 are in government schools. Our missionary is called upon to travel a reservation seventy miles in length and thirty miles in width. The character of the service is extremely varied, touching the school life of the children, looking after the poor, meeting groups in camps and ministering to the sick. Conditions among them are pitiful, as many are blind from trachoma and a large number suffer from tuberculosis. A modern equipment and parsonage are vitally necessary.

At Farmington, New Mexico, we maintain a mission school for Navajo children, but there is need of two new buildings, a dormitory and a hospital, and the enlarging of our present school house. The present capacity is forty-five children. There are 9,000 children of school age on this reservation, but school facilities to care for only 2,000, leaving 7,000 to grow up in ignorance. At Schurz, Nevada, is the Walker River Reservation with 500 Indians. Our church has the sole responsibility for their religious training, but the church building is more than forty years old and is in a dangerous condition.

Educational pioneering.—No story of the extension of the Kingdom of Christ throughout this vast frontier would be complete without a tribute to those who have blazed much of the trail, the missionaries who have sought out the obscure villages and scattered settlements and planted Sunday schools, the usual forerunner of the church. In mud huts, log school houses, settlers' shanties, and sometimes in barrooms, they have gathered the little groups together and set them on their spiritual journey. Just as this territory has been sanctified by the footsteps of brave bearers of the flaming cross, so

Higher education.—Methodism, born in a university, has never ceased to stress the religious value of education or the value of religious education. Along with the frontier church has gone the frontier college and both have grown into commanding influence together. This process is under way in the Mountain states. Here our institutions may not be as numerous as in the east, but they are virile, progressive and of high ideals, and are altering the currents of the developing civilization. At Helena is Montana Wesleyan College and at Gooding, Idaho, is Gooding College. While under separate management, the University of Denver and the Iliff School of Theology adjoin, and academically the School of Theology is related to the University precisely as though it were a graduate school of the University.

Iliff School of Theology.—The School of Theology was founded nearly forty years ago in answer to the need of a training school for the ministry in the great territory west of the Mississippi. First a department of Denver University, it later became a separate institution, but standing in friendly relation with it. Privileges of the school are extended upon equal terms to members of all Christian churches. The school offers not only the standard theological training, but also stresses courses in Rural Church Life, Religious Education and Church Methods. Its Rural Church Extension Department and Field Service for Town and Country Churches are of outstanding value to the section in establishing modern community church programs.

Denver University.—Denver University has 2,500 or more students. Its Graduate School, the College of Liberal Arts and the Schools of Chemical Engineering, Electrical Engineering and Pharmacy are on the campus proper. The Dental College, School of Law and School of Commerce are in the business section of the city.

Health opportunities.—Thousands journey to the Mountain states yearly for their health. The altitude, climatic and atmospheric conditions make it a haven for those afflicted particularly with lung diseases. Many have wealth, but many others spend their last cent in getting to the mountains, often their last hope of earthly life.

A number of hospitals for their care are maintained by different organizations of the Methodist Episcopal Church. One is the Methodist Deaconess Hospital at Albuquerque, New Mexico, conducted by the Chapel building, University of Denver

Woman's Home Missionary Society. It was opened in 1912 and has a capacity of sixty-six beds. The property consists of two fine buildings and twenty-five cottages.

The most ambitious project of the church is the proposed National Methodist Episcopal Sanatorium for Tuberculosis at Colorado Springs, Colorado. Since 1910 the Woman's Home Missionary Society has maintained Beth-El Hospital, with 103 beds, at Colorado Springs, one of the best hospital properties in Methodism. Now it has given this $250,000 property to the church at large and under the supervision of the Board of Hospitals and Homes, it is planned to erect a larger institution. The Colorado Springs Chamber of Commerce has given a new site of twenty-one acres. The first unit of the new institution will have 250 beds. Charity work will play a large part in the new hospital.

Women's achievements in Montana.—For generations to come the currents of Montana life will feel the spiritual power given in the early days by the pioneering services of the General Deaconess Board and the deaconesses in this frontier state. Hospitals, schools, missions, Sunday schools and other institutions and organizations were founded by them, and relief work done.

The task at hand.—The Mountain states comprise a section of great promise. Life is still plastic. Missionary work, it is true, has been going on for half a century, but with an era of tremendous expansion beginning and with fundamental social and economic changes under way, the imperative summons comes to the church not merely to continue its labors, but more emphatically to expand its effort and adapt it to the needs of the new day. Just as the downtown city church or the rural church of the East must alter its program to its specific needs, so must there be similar procedure in missionary work on the frontier. Trained leadership is the key.

Urgent needs, in addition to those already noted in Mormon territory, which demand immediate response, are many and varied.

Arizona village and parish, where Methodist work is struggling with neither parsonage nor church building.

IRRIGATION—THE MAGICIAN OF THE WEST

From the higher plane of political and intellectual and moral interests the Pacific Basin will be the one great theater of human events for all the centuries to come.

JAMES W. BASHFORD

PACIFIC STATES

A NEW WORLD IN THE MAKING

Looking East through the Golden Gate.—The world-seer no longer stands within the portals of America and looking toward the setting sun thinks of the Pacific Coast as the farthest western portion of the United States. In the shift and development of world affairs, he has taken a new point of observation. It is beyond the ocean shore, and he has turned his face toward the rising sun. Looking east through the Golden Gate, he sees the eastern boundary of the Pacific Basin.

As the eastern rim of the Pacific Basin, the Pacific states form a new world in the making. They are in the circle of the greatest population centers of the earth and of the countries which are the markets of the future. Around that rim will be found Canada, Alaska, Siberia, Manchuria, Korea, Japan, China, the Philippines, Australia, the islands of the south Pacific, South and Central America—lands that are awakening and demanding and giving the fruits of modern civilization. From the United States, the port of entry to it is the Pacific Coast. Atlantic trade has been a paramount influence in the expansion of our eastern states. What expansion of trade with the Orient and South America will mean to the Pacific states, no prophet is needed to foretell. The era of industrialism and intensified agriculture already has begun. The possibilities are endless. A half century may easily see our western coast as thickly settled and as highly developed as the eastern.

America's fastest growing region.—As if prophetic of a new epoch, the growth of Washington, Oregon and California for the last census decade, 1910-20, has been the most rapid of any geographical division of the United States, 32.8 per cent. The population in 1920 was 5,556,871, an increase of 1,374,564 in ten years. Of that number, 1,033,868 were foreign-born and 47,790 were Negroes. The increase in foreign-born was twenty per cent and of Negroes 63.7 per cent. A strong urbanizing influence is indicated over a thirty-year period. In 1890, the population was 42.5 per cent urban and 57.5 rural, while in 1920 it had changed to 62.4 per cent urban and 37.6 per cent rural. Illiterates numbered 123,435 or 2.7 per cent.

Pacific Coast cities.—Los Angeles, a mecca for a large migration, transient and permanent, from the East and Middle West, due to its climate and scenery, with 576,673 people, is the metropolis of the Pacific Coast states. It gained 257,475 people between 1910 and 1920, one of the three fastest growing cities of more than 100,000 population in the United States.

San Francisco with 506,676 people, for a generation the largest city on the coast, is now in second place. With Oakland's 216,261 people, however, and other communities just across the bay from San Francisco, the "bay region" forms the heaviest populated metropolitan area on the coast. San Francisco not only is the Golden Gate to the sea, but is also a gateway to the great California Valley. Her steamships reach out to Asia, Alaska, Australia, South America, and through the Panama Canal to the eastern states and to Europe.

Seattle, on Puget Sound, a deep and beautiful body of water, has enough harbors to hold ten times the ships of all the world. Tacoma near by with 96,965 people has access to the same harbor facilities, and the city and industrial prophets of the future predict ultimately a great Puget Sound city, one of the densely populated centers of America.

Portland, the "Rose City" with 258,288 people, the fourth coast city in size, on the Willamette River, a short distance from the Columbia, has deepened her harbor so that the largest ships can enter, greatly increasing her foreign trade. As from San Francisco, the steamship lines from Portland and Puget Sound carry food and factory goods to Alaska; lumber, machinery, cotton and flour to the Orient and Latin America, and are building a heavy export trade through the Panama Canal.

These four metropolitan centers of the Pacific coast have been and are still rivals for supremacy. Our interest in them is not which one will be first in industry and commerce, but which one will first become a city of God.

The Coast spirit.—An optimistic spirit of achievement is characteristic of the Pacific states, and the section is conscious of a future. The unparalleled developments of irrigation projects and of water power, the rapid stride of the cities and the tremendous projects under way in industry and the opening up of new lands for grain and fruit-raising, are indicative of this development. Conservatism may still exist in some of the older sections which had their first development in the gold rush in 1849, but they too are falling into the march of progress.

WHERE METHODISM STANDS

The statistical record.—The Methodist Episcopal Church has in this section 174,501 members, of whom 166,170 are white English-speaking, 820 are Latin, 2,339 are German, 2,363 Scandinavian, 1,993 Oriental, and 462 Indian. In the Sunday-school enrolment are 225,972 English-speaking white, 1,931 Latin, 2,647 German, 2,566 Scandinavian, 871 Indian, and 2,243 Oriental. There are 1,202 churches, of which 1,072 are white, English-speaking, eleven Latin, forty-one German, forty-one Scandinavian, twenty-two Oriental, and ten Indian. The net value of churches and parsonages is $15,645,191, while the total local expenses for 1922 were $4,480,142. Benevolences were $1,483,418. The total paid for all purposes was $5,963,560 for the year, a per capita giving of $34.17, the largest of all the geographical divisions.

Bishop Leonard states that there never has been a time when the Methodist Episcopal Church on the Pacific Coast was in as commanding a position as it is today, and expresses the conviction that we are facing an utterly unprecedented situation, demanding churches for new rapidly growing communities, and adapting and re-locating many churches due to shifting populations.

In the great Northwest, Bishop Shepard affirms that the Methodist Episcopal Church today stands first among all the denominations numerically, and is probably first in its educational and philanthropic work. He and his co-laborers are laying strong and wide foundations for the future. His greatest problem is the securing of capable men.

PROBLEMS FACING THE CHURCH

In rural territory.—While the Pacific states are classified as frontier territory, they do not present the rural missionary problem in terms of scattered settlements and isolated families in the proportion that the Mountain states do. In the eastern sections of Washington and Oregon, particularly, will be found the ranchers and homesteaders, but the bulk of the farm population is in the Puget Sound-Willamette Valley regions.

New irrigation projects, opening up large farming territories, are characteristic of the region. California leads the nation in irrigation development, its enormous output of fruit and grain being largely attributed thereto. In Oregon, more than 1,000,000 acres are under irrigation, and projects for 2,000,000 more acres are under way. Washington has large irrigated districts all the way from its southern part to the Canadian boundary.

Between the old and new pioneering, there is a vital difference. Opening up virgin prairies to settlement often meant half a century of missionary support before the community became sufficiently populated or prosperous to make a strong, self-sustaining church. The new irrigation development is almost a mathematical certainty, and the missionary project should become the missionary-giving church in one-fifth to one-third the time the former required. Speed, therefore, is a large element in the irrigation project missionary program. Quick and liberal action by the church at large is necessary if responsible religious work is to be established.

The logging camps.—The many thousands of men who live in the bunk houses, work in the timber and are beset by vice and iniquity offer not only one of the most picturesque but also one of the most important home missionary opportunities before the church. Many of them help to form that large army of migrant workers with no vital spiritual life and sometimes out of touch with civilization itself.

"In the Puget Sound Conference" writes one of our sky pilots in Washington, "there are 962 lumber camps, employing 25,690 men, and 1,031 mills, employing 72,545 men. Some of these camps are thirty-five miles or more from a settlement and are reached only by the logging camp railroad. The territory covered by one of our three lumber camp evangelists is thirty-six miles long and here are more than 3,000 people of whom only two and one-half per cent are professing Christians. Of the 700 public school children, only a very few know what a Sunday school is like.

"In these camps bolshevism, I.W.W.'ism, and ultra radical teachings thrive. Work ceases early in the day and during the long winter nights the men gather in the bunk-houses, where many of them gamble, argue, and sometimes fight. Hospital visitation is an important part of the program of thrift, health, education and evangelism of the camps, and this Christlike ministration is not soon forgotten by the men. A number of regular pastors assist in this camp work. Sunday schools are organized, and many men have united with the churches near these camps, over 200 taking this step in one camp."

Race groups.—Spanish-speaking, principally Mexicans, are the predominant foreign-speaking groups faced by the church in the Pacific states. Large colonies of southern Europeans, principally Italians, will be found in several cities, and the task of reaching them with evangelical Christianity is similar to the industrial cities of the East.

Chinese in the three states numbered 34,265 in 1920, distributed as follows: 2,363 in Washington, 3,090 in Oregon, and 28,812 in California. Japanese totalled 93,490 in the Pacific group, California having 71,952, Oregon 4,151 and Washington 17,387. The Chinese population is steadily decreasing, due to the death rate, and voluntary migration back to China. The Japanese are steadily increasing, due to the incoming of "picture brides" up to a recent date, the establishment of family life and the rearing of large families of children. The Chinese come for a sojourn, the Japanese to colonize and to build a permanent community life.

The essential problem faced by the church concerning the Orientals is not the form of its missionary service. The type of ministry which succeeds abroad is adaptable here. The success of home missions already attained among the Japanese and Chinese is the proof. But the church must create a Christian basis for the solution of interracial problems between the native Americans and the Orientals.

Rapid growth of the cities.—Rapid increase of population always offers a challenge to the church. Suburban communities spring up with amazing speed, and although they bespeak prosperity in appearance, yet they are investment opportunities which have always been recognized by the church. Most of the new homes are sold on the basis of a small cash payment and the rest in instalments that generally consume the financial margin of those struggling to get established. Hence the need for help in building churches and providing the right leadership which will at the very start command the respect of the community.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL ACHIEVEMENTS

Off the beaten track.—Sixty miles from the railroad is located Fall River Mills, California, a three circuit charge. The entire field is almost completely isolated, yet a rather extensive agricultural and industrial development has taken place. A home missionary pastor is ministering to the needs of the people in this remote territory. At Cedarville in Surprise Valley in the northern part of the state, there are three points where preaching is maintained with a membership of 170. This valley will some day be largely developed through irrigation. In a remote district in eastern Washington, a survey some time ago showed 104 school districts with no religious service. The population in all of them is 4,000. A missionary, supported by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, conducts preaching service and Sunday school in many of them, and wins many to the Christian way of life. These are typical missionary enterprises in the isolated regions of the Pacific states.

In the towns.—A successful community work and an adequate building has meant new life in the Methodist Episcopal Church at Pasco, Washington. A comparatively new brick block was bought and remodelled, providing a splendid auditorium and other rooms for social, recreational, welfare and other activities. It has a pastor's study and a church office, besides housing many organizations. Before the building was purchased and the community program was promulgated, the membership met for worship in a small one-room and one-day-in-seven church. The membership was less than half a hundred with a Sunday morning attendance of twenty people. The membership has since passed 200 and the average attendance exceeds that number. The Sunday-school enrolment in the old church was eighty-six, with an average attendance of fifty. Today the enrolment is 366, with an average attendance of 200.

At Bend, Oregon, a church adequately equipped is steadily progressing in relating itself to every constructive phase of community life. At Lakeview, Oregon, the Methodist Episcopal Church is preparing for the growth of the community through enlarged lumber industry and through extensive irrigation projects.

These community churches and others like them are types of those which the progressive mind of the Pacific Coast is expected to develop in the course of the coming decade.

Among the lumberjacks.—Methodism's ministry to the men who work in the forests is two-fold: that rendered by the pastors of towns and villages in the lumber regions, who go out into the camps and render what service they are able: the other is that performed by missionaries commissioned for the particular task. Primitive conditions and hardships are often their portion, but nowhere is a more thrilling achievement being rendered in the name of the Kingdom.

During one month, one of these sky pilots to the lumberjacks made thirty camp calls and gave twenty camp talks; collected 8,000 magazines and delivered 5,000 of them among these men who are out of touch with the world; made twenty hospital visits and 100 calls on the sick; wrote a letter to the State Industrial Insurance Department concerning a logger's claim; delivered two people to the hospital and took one home; took twenty-five bouquets to hospital; installed at a hospital a good standard library purchased with gifts from citizens of the community; preached eight times; had three professed conversions; conducted two funerals; added five members to the church; and visited three Sunday schools.

Among the miners.—For thirty years efforts of Protestantism to maintain a ministry in the great coal fields of the state of Washington have been notoriously weak. Yet a remarkable piece of service is being rendered by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension at Wilkeson, one of the most important mining centers of the state. Here a Methodist Episcopal pastor is interpreting the message of the Kingdom among a population of 4,000 Austrians, Italians, Finns, Welsh, Poles, Germans, Slovaks, English, Swedes, Bohemians, Hungarians, French, Scotch, Belgians, Swiss, Russians, and Canadians.

The only other churches are an unused Greek Catholic and a small Roman Catholic with services once a month. Vice, and gambling have long run wide open. When the missionary pastor arrived two years ago, he found a small Sunday school of three teachers and twenty-five children. There are now nine classes with an average attendance of ninety-four, a boys' club of twenty, a girls' club of sixteen, and a Junior choir of sixteen. The attendance at preaching services has increased from sixteen to 140. A Thanksgiving service had an attendance of 300, and a Christmas entertainment of 800. Welfare and social work are being developed and the community life is gradually being transformed.

Among the Chinese.—The Pacific Chinese Mission, with an English-speaking superintendent, has eighteen appointments, all of them in charge of Chinese pastors. Only one of them is listed as "to be supplied," the work now being contemplated among the 500 Chinese in San Antonio, Texas. These appointments are all in California except the churches at Phoenix, Arizona; Reno, Nevada, and San Antonio, Texas.

We have six schools for the teaching of Chinese to children and young people, and nine evening schools for the teaching of English to young men.

We have boys in these schools who are sons of fathers now in China who themselves were trained in our schools. Many men who are of great influence in civic and moral life in China were thus started in their American training by us. Our immediate necessity is for teachers and workers who have both the English and Chinese languages, which means that our leaders must have specialized training.

The Pacific Japanese Mission.—The Pacific Japanese Mission is divided into six groups, four of which are in California.

They are the San Francisco Bay region, with five centers of work; the Sacramento Valley, with six centers; the San Joaquin Valley, with two centers; and Southern California with four centers. In Washington and Oregon there are several appointments.

The following activities are listed in nearly every church: worship and evangelism; religious education; social service; recreation; welfare; and Americanization.

Los Angeles and Los Angeles County have the largest Japanese population of any town and county in the United States. Our substantial and growing Methodist congregation, now inadequately housed, is planning for a splendid new building. In Berkeley a large Japanese student body attends the University of California.

The Sacramento Valley is a natural center for Japanese work. Two missions, at Florin and Loomis have already grown out of the Sacramento Mission. The mother church continues to show remarkable vitality. In a few months thirty-five children and many adults were baptized. The membership and Sunday school each exceed one hundred. In the Oakland Japanese Church is strong Americanization and evangelistic work. Among its 198 members are business men, merchants, laborers, and students. Brawley is our Japanese center in the Imperial Valley. The whole section has been allocated to the Methodist Episcopal Church by the Oriental Missions Council.

The Anglo-Japanese School.—In San Francisco is one of the oldest features of our Pacific Japanese Mission. From the Anglo-Japanese School have come a large number of the finest type of Christians, both ministers and laymen, including one ambassador from Japan to the United States. It is largely self-sustaining. In 1922, 282 students were enrolled, of whom 252 were men and thirty were women. Nearly all were graduates of grammar schools in Japan, others of high schools, and a few from the Imperial University at Tokyo.

The Latin American Mission.—Important advances in recent years in the work among Mexicans and other Spanish-speaking people, especially in New Mexico, Arizona, and California, indicate possibilities of reaching Mexico with the message of Protestantism from this point of vantage.

In California, we have twenty-six circuits for Mexicans, covering fifty-four points. Through schools, social service, and a varied ministry, these Latin Americans are slowly but surely seeing the meaning of the Gospel of Christ. The progress which is possible is illustrated by Selma, California, where, after a missionary worker was put in the field, the local forces got together and built a chapel for the Mexicans. In one year 179 people were added to the church, and the pastor has reached out to three other points where he has organized missions and secured volunteer workers converted in his own mission to lead these new centers. Employed here is a well-trained Mexican deaconess, herself a product of the work. One of the converts was a bootlegger who after his conversion not only destroyed his liquor supply but sought out the man from whom he had stolen the grapes and insisted on paying for them!

The Plaza Community Center.—The Plaza Community Center of Los Angeles is the very heart of our Mexican work in California. Besides the transient population there is a more or less permanent Mexican population of about 15,000 in this one parish.

For years Methodist work on the Plaza has been carried on in two small, one-story frame structures, so cramped that often it has been necessary to use a single room for six different purposes. Yet, in spite of such handicaps, a program has been developed which includes seven religious services in Spanish each week; three jail services; the distribution of tracts and Scriptures; the Plaza Christian Training School for Mexican theological students and young women missionaries; a Sunday school with a membership of 220; Epworth League with attendance of ninety; Epworth League Gospel team, doing unexcelled extension work; classes in nursing, homemaking, dietetics, and the care of infants; a day nursery for children of working mothers; young men's, women's and girls' clubs; special social events, picnics, suppers, socials and hikes; an employment bureau; a medical clinic; relief work and a legal consultation service.

Manual training—Spanish-American Institute, Gardena, California

During a recent twelve months, 15,000 people came to the Plaza Community Center for special consultation, 5,400 applications for work were received and 1,500 jobs secured, 19,440 attended services at the church. Long delayed plans for a new building are now being realized. This one institution so strategically located is rendering an incalculable personal ministry in interpreting the spirit of Jesus Christ, both to Old Mexico and to the multitudes of Mexicans who within recent years have found refuge in America.

The Gardena school.—The Spanish-American Institute at Gardena, organized seven years ago, has today the greatest attendance on record, enrolling 100 pupils, and furnishing for Mexican boys who do not know English an opportunity to get an education in a fine social and Christian environment. It offers a definite training to fit them to meet the needs of the Mexican people. The school owns twenty acres of productive land on which have been erected eight buildings.

The Frances De Pauw School in Los Angeles is a similar school in practical training for Spanish-speaking girls conducted by the Woman's Home Missionary Society.

Other Latin groups.—For several years Filipinos—mostly young men, alert, loyal Americans, have been migrating to America, many settling on the Pacific Coast, especially in San Francisco and Southern California. It has resulted in the formation of the Filipino Christian Fellowship, composed of students and business and professional folk. Each Sunday afternoon there is a devotional service followed by a social hour. The membership has passed the one hundred mark. It has resulted in the promotion of friendship, and good will.

Many Portuguese are in Oakland, Tulare, Stockton and the Santa Clara Valley. Several circuits have been formed, and our missionary pastors have succeeded in establishing centers of work and worship and are gradually winning the confidence of the people.

Summing up.—A nine months' report of the Latin American mission is illuminating. "We have held or assisted in 7,783 meetings with an attendance of 89,053; 3,134 sermons have been preached, 48,039 visits made; workers have traveled 128,477 miles, placed 2,514 copies of God's Word, given out 38,242 tracts, and distributed food or clothing in 2,279 cases of need." During a year there were 650 conversions, 113 baptisms, 150 received into full membership, and 282 into preparatory membership; 1,616 additional adherents were reported.

Methodism in the cities.—Methodism is proving in the Pacific Coast cities that it can adapt itself to metropolitan conditions and can solve the city problem.

For half a century the First Church of Sacramento held faithfully to its task of a conventional ministry. Then the new flood poured in—Japanese, Chinese, Portuguese, Italians, Serbs, Poles, Hungarians, Hindus, Greeks and Mexicans. Thirty-one nationalities in all took possession of that portion of the city. Though losing in membership, the old church did not falter. With far vision, it began adjustment to meet the even greater needs of the polyglot population. The new program included service to the needs of its immediate community. It became known as "American Center." During a recent winter of severe unemployment, 20,000 men received free shelter and food and work was found for hundreds. During the same winter, the gospel in Spanish and English was preached to 20,000 men at regular Sunday public worship and at school age. There are five hundred industrial establishments in the parish.

A thorough survey revealed the needs. The work was begun, a staff built up, and the program for the future adopted. The playground and social rooms became the haven for hundreds in their search for recreation and for friendship. Clubs, classes, and group organizations were formed. At present the attendance at all activities is running 1,800 per week, the capacity of the present quarters.

Plans are under way for new buildings which will provide for worship, religious education, social service, and recreation. The new location is on one of the main thoroughfares of the city. Help from the church at large is necessary to make possible this enlarged plan to week-night street meetings. Services are conducted in five languages—Japanese, Chinese, Spanish, Portuguese, and English. On one occasion 700 Japanese were present.

A Church of All Nations.—In a parish of 60,000 people of forty-two nationalities, is the Los Angeles Church of All Nations. Poverty, congestion, bad housing, vice and crime are some of the social problems. The section produces more juvenile delinquents than any other part of the city. Except for a small school playground and that of the church, there is no play space for more than five thousand children of care for 5,000 needy people per week in a widely varied ministry.

For the abundant life.—Woodland Park Church, Seattle, has under way a new community church plant, the first unit of which provides equipment for religious education and social recreational features. Its community church creed is: "Jesus came that men might have abundant life. This church will be built to help folks find that abundance for every department of life."

At Portland, the list of church projects inspired, aided and brought to successful completion, or now in process of construction as the result of Centenary effort, is the testimony of the vision and intelligent devotion of our church leaders to Portland's larger needs. The entire Portland district has been lifted in physical equipment and morale.

In Tacoma, Central Church was condemned by the building inspector. Its membership represented meager financial resources, many of their bread winners being out of work. So the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension and the larger churches in Tacoma came to the rescue by providing a new worthy building which houses the social and religious work and the Goodwill Industries for the community. Bethany Church has completed a new community hall equipped with much needed Sunday-school rooms, a fine gymnasium, and a social center.

In Spokane, capital of the Inland Empire, Centenary Church, with a parish population of 40,000, has supplanted its old one-room building with a modern plant adapted to community service.

Goodwill Industries.—One of the most interesting of the Goodwill Industries is located at San Francisco, growing out of a free employment bureau conducted by a downtown pastor. He served two years without salary, putting in $1,000 of his own money to get the enterprise started. The third year it did $80,000 worth of business.

In Los Angeles the Goodwill Industries largely serve the Mexican population.

Women's Home Missions.—Schools, kindergartens, relief work and religious ministry comprise the characteristic service of the Woman's Home Missionary Society throughout the Pacific states. Japanese, Italians, Chinese, Mexicans, Koreans, and other nationalities are among those helped.

Indian stations.—Methodism's ministry to the North American Indians, in the Pacific states, is larger than in any other division of the country, except the East North Central states, where the number of missions is the same, fourteen. At Nespelem, Washington, forty miles back from the railroad, dozens of Indian young men gather nightly at the church. The only other place open is the pool hall. A community house would enable the church greatly to enlarge its work. On the Siletz reservation in Oregon, Methodism has the sole responsibility among six hundred Indians. Our church has a membership of more than one hundred. A demonstration farm is maintained at the Beatty, Education.—Among the colleges and universities, some of them among the foremost and progressive in the world, Methodism, true to her tradition, has a large representation.

In Tacoma, the College of Puget Sound has just completed a $1,500,000 campaign for building and endowment. A magnificent campus has been purchased and it is expected that the new buildings will soon be constructed.

At Salem, Oregon, Willamette University, which is the oldest educational institution west of the Rocky Mountains, has just increased its endowment to $2,000,000, and has received new funds for building and equipment. Kimball School of Theology at Salem has recently been reorganized and is filling a larger place in the thought of the church.

The University of Southern California in Los Angeles is now entering upon a ten-million-dollar campaign for endowment. A new building will be erected to house the activities of the McClay School of Religion. The university is not only an institution of strong, Christian influence, but serves all the needs of the great municipal university.

The College of the Pacific at San Jose has recently secured a million and a half dollars in endowment, and is planning to relocate at Stockton, the doorway to the great San Joaquin Valley.

Wesley Foundation beginnings.—The Pacific states report at least 5,000 Methodist students at non-Methodist institutions. In Oregon the work done by our churches at the state college centers, Eugene and Corvallis, is of vital importance. The enrolment of Methodist students at the Oregon Agricultural College, Corvallis, already equals the membership of the church. A modern church building is now in process which will make possible a social and religious ministry for the thousands of young people who through the years will be entrusted to the Corvallis Church.

At Seattle, near the University of Washington, two dwellings have been purchased and have been remodeled to form very satisfactory temporary quarters for study groups, conferences with students, and social functions.

The Bible car at San Francisco

At Berkeley, California, an unusually constructive work among the students at the state university is being done by Trinity Church. Enlargement plans call for an educational building, a social center, and an auditorium to seat 1,200 people.

Methodist work is also being established at the State Agricultural College of Washington at Pullman and at the California Agricultural Experiment Station at Davis.

Social service.—The organized philanthropy of the church is represented in nineteen hospitals, homes and orphanages scattered through the three states. Among them is the Deaconess Hospital at Spokane, with building and equipment valued at $500,000, the Deaconess Hospital at Wenatchee, Washington, valued at $150,000, and the General Hospital at Seattle.

Typical needs.—Rapid growth in population and the opening up of new regions for settlement constitute the missionary problem and opportunity. The opportunity is the field, the problem is the enlistment of leadership and resources sufficient to meet the need. Immediate needs, involving vital work already started, are pressing in the Pacific states:

New building in industrial section of city where people of little means now worship in old, decrepit structure.

Worker to reach sailors and civilian mechanics at large naval station.

New building for Mexican congregation now crowded into an old, unsuitable building.

Community house for Italian congregation now housed in structure repulsive to those who love the beautiful.

New church for Indian congregation now worshipping in an old, abandoned government warehouse, which looks more like a barn than a church.

Community building for Indian reservation where only destructive forces provide any social life.

Church to reach 3,500 unchurched Italians and Portuguese in industrial community.

Community church building for parish of 20,000 near large shipbuilding plants.

Social center for Norwegian-Danish congregation, ministering to many foreign-speaking sailors.

Support of worker in Japanese community where Buddhist influences are strong.

Expansion of foreign-speaking school work to meet the demands upon it.

Completion of Japanese Mission building strategically located in large city and able to do influential work.

Community center for church in parish of 60,000, mostly Japanese and Jews. Church doing a large work with inadequate equipment.

Parsonage in Mexican border town with a population of about 5,000.

New church to replace a shack which is falling apart, located in dry farming region turning to irrigation. Population of 3,500 expected largely to increase.

Replace condemned building in rapidly growing educational center.

Community church building in mining community of 4,000 with ten pool rooms and dance halls.

Church in center of irrigated fruit growing region, a packing house now being used for part of growing Methodist work. Our sole responsibility in population of 3,600.

Looking forward.—"Where there is no vision, the people perish," may well be applied to the church. Methodism has lived because it has seen the spiritual poverty of mankind and has sought to provide the unsearchable riches of Christ Jesus. True to its commission, it has moved westward with the multitudes who have gone out to build new empires. It journeys on with Anglo-Saxonism as it makes its final stand on the Pacific Coast. It now steps beyond the shores and faces east again, looking through the Golden Gate and viewing the Pacific Coast as the eastern rim of the Pacific Basin. It sees there a land of vast missionary opportunity, a portion of the earth's territory which in the future is destined to have a profound influence on all the rest of the world. It has set its hand to the plow to till the soil and sow the seeds of the kingdom of Christ that a new world may come forth. Having set its hand to the plow, it will not turn back.

THE NOME LIMITED

The United States government wiped out yellow fever by abolishing unsanitary conditions. The church must wipe out immorality and irreligion by processes of education, worship and community service.

THE TERRITORIES

ALASKA

A LAND OF TREASURE

Shall we give as we get?—When William H. Seward paid seven million dollars for 590,900 square miles of ice and snow, most of the United States united in derision. Yet “Seward’s Folly” has turned out to contain an amazing wealth of gold, copper, tin and coal, millions of acres that can be cultivated and waters teeming with salmon.

But, although the country is as large as all the United States east of the Mississippi with the exception of Florida, the population in 1920 was only 55,036—almost 10,000 less than in 1910.

This decrease in the population is, of course, due to the fact that Alaska yields her riches only to the hardiest and most determined of men. Nor will spiritual victories be won in this stern land save by the display of the same sort of courage that has marked the search for material wealth.

Since gold was discovered in the Yukon men have gone to Alaska almost exclusively to get something from her. Today we are beginning to see that the future depends upon our willingness to give something to her. The spiritual welfare of her Americans, English, Spanish, and Norwegians, as well as the Aleuts, Athabaskan Indians and Eskimos depends upon the service which the Christian church renders.

Alaska today.—Alaska is America’s last frontier. Its inaccessibility is being somewhat changed by the building of railways but it is still true that, after one leaves the three short lines so far developed, the only means of travel is by mushing it on foot or by dog-sled over trails that are passable only during the severe winter months. Settlements are widely scattered and communication difficult.

The white population is of an extremely shifting character. Much of it "goes out" during the winter to Seattle, San Francisco or southern California. While in Alaska, white men wander from one mining camp to another, or from one fishery to the next, ever on the search for higher wages and almost never settling.

Besides white men, the Indians and Eskimos, present a missionary problem. Only a slight advance has been made toward the evangelization of these.

THE PROGRAM OF THE CHURCH

A defined territory.—In the face of the problems of distance and communications, the Christian churches in Alaska have wisely delimited the territory for which each is responsible.

A glance at the map on page 406 will show that the Methodist Episcopal Church is at work at Ketchikan, Petersburg, Juneau, Seward, Skagway, Nome, Fairbanks, and Unalaska. The funds available have been too limited to care even for these restricted responsibilities.

Methodist church and parsonage, Alaska

What the field requires.—At Ketchikan, a strong fishing center, there is a varied social type of evangelism among the Scandinavians and English-speaking population. During the fishing season from one to three hundred of the 1,200 fishing boats, each with a crew of four or five men are constantly in port. With a proper chapel and clubroom much can be done to protect these men from the vices common to such places. The same thing is true in Petersburg.

Juneau is one of the most promising towns in Alaska. Seward is the strategic center for the Kenai peninsula.

In Nome is to be found one of the fine institutions under the direction of the

Sewing class in the Jesse Lee Home

Woman's Home Missionary Society. The work originally consisted of a church, parsonage, hospital and gymnasium. At the time of the first influenza epidemic all the adult Eskimos in the town died, leaving over two hundred children as orphans. These have been gathered in the gymnasium, where they are being cared for as well as the makeshift quarters permit.

Far out on the Aleutian Islands, pointing at the nearby coast of Asia, is the Jesse Lee Home at Unalaska, in which seventy Aleutian children are gathered by the Woman's Home Missionary Society. The superintendent, Dr. Newhall, is the only physician within 600 miles.

The immediate need.—It is the purpose of the Methodist Episcopal Church to staff adequately all its centers in Alaska and to give them an equipment that will make it possible to deal effectively with the needs of this neglected territory.

HAWAII

THE CROSSROADS OF THE PACIFIC

On the road to everywhere.—With all this talk about the coming importance of the Pacific, it behooves world citizens to pay attention to Hawaii. For it is impossible to go much of anywhere in this vital basin without touching this group of islands. Pass through the Panama Canal, Yokohama bound, and you break your voyage at Honolulu. Leave one commonwealth of the British empire at Vancouver to reach another at Sidney and you stop at Honolulu. Embark from one great republic at San Francisco, to debark at another in Shanghai, and you pause part way at Honolulu. When it comes to patrolling the Pacific Basin, Hawaii will be found on the road to everywhere.

A problem in amalgamation.—It is not hard for the enraptured climate-booster to grow lyrical about Hawaii. But to many of Hawaii's leaders, however, there seems today little time to give to the climate. Political and social problems demand instant attention, foremost among them that of racial amalgamation.

Talk as you will about the conditions in American cities, you will find that Uncle Sam has no more refractory melting pot than Hawaii. Out of a population of 256,000 there are estimated to be 110,000 Japanese, 23,000 Chinese, 21,000 Filipinos, and 5,000 Koreans. In addition, there are 24,000 Hawaiians and about 27,000 Portuguese.

The remainder are mainly Americans, many of them descendants of the first missionaries to the islands.

What are you to do with a group like that, especially when it is the Orientals who are increasing most rapidly, and when many of them, faced by the drastic citizenship laws of the United States, show every disposition to tighten the ties that bind them to their former homes? This intricate but important problem underlies much of our work in Hawaii.

WHAT THE CHURCH IS ATTEMPTING

Methodism in Hawaii.—The Methodist Episcopal Church came to Hawaii first in the early '50s, and then went away again. It found the missionaries of other societies doing an adequate work, so, in accordance with the general policy of the church, it withdrew.

The beginning of the Oriental influx, however, completely changed conditions. The churches in Hawaii petitioned for the return of the Methodists, who were able to send workers already familiar with the language and custom of Japanese, Koreans, and Filipinos. Down to the present, practically all the Protestant work done among the fast-increasing Filipinos is that of our church.

In addition to the service among these racial groups, there is also a strong congregation in Honolulu ministering to the English-speaking community there.

Types of work.—There are two Japanese Methodist churches in Honolulu, one of which is now being relocated and reconstructed. Both are well staffed and are having a wide influence throughout the islands. There are fourteen Japanese workers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Hawaiian Islands, with no church property except the two churches in Honolulu and the new property just purchased on the island of Maui.

In the city of Honolulu there has been for a number of years a Korean Methodist church and compound. During the past year a new location has been secured and church and compound reconstructed. There are ten Korean workers in the islands, but no other property.

The Centenary has made possible the First Filipino Methodist Episcopal Church in Honolulu. Twelve Filipino workers carry on a program throughout the settlements of their countrymen, but there is no other property.

Facing the future.—The Methodist Episcopal Church is at work in the islands of Oahu, Kauai, Hawaii, and Maui. With the exception of the Japanese, Korean, and Filipino churches in Honolulu and one church in the island of Maui, used by both Japanese and Filipinos, the church is dependent for places of worship and for residences for its workers upon property loaned by the sugar planters. It is most urgent that steps be taken to secure suitable property in all of the centers in which work is being carried on. The Oriental has come to Hawaii to stay. He must be shown that the church has come to stay with him.

At the Schofield Barracks, the largest army post in the entire service, twenty-seven miles from Honolulu, the church faces a peculiar responsibility. With no house of worship within nine miles, the church has been requested to build a chapel for which the government will provide rock and most of the labor. The chapel, when built, will serve 9,000 men in the United States army.

RESPONSIBILITY IN THE ANTILLES

A Spanish legacy.—Porto Rico, although under the American flag, is a land of an alien tongue. For more than four hundred years it was ruled by Spain. Under this tutelage little advance was made by the people. When the United States took over the island, 85 per cent of the population was illiterate.

Poverty and plenty.—Porto Rico should be a land of plenty. Its soil is able to produce with all the generosity that marks the semi-tropics. But only a quarter of the land is under cultivation, and this must support approximately four hundred people for every square mile of the island!

The Department of Agriculture reports that there are 300,000 barefoot people living in the poorer sections of the island who have scarcely enough to satisfy their absolute needs.

Under American rule, however, improved economic and social conditions are coming. Before the coming of the United States, for example, Porto Rico was producing 68,000 tons of sugar annually; in 1917 the production was 488,000 tons.

Where Catholicism fell short.—From the time of Columbus until that of McKinley the Roman Catholic Church had a free field in Porto Rico. Nor should its service be underestimated. From the Catholic conception of the church, the island's religious needs were fairly well served.

The most obvious shortcoming of the church under Spanish rule was its failure to touch rural Porto Rico. And only 283,934 of the 1,299,809 people in Porto Rico live in the cities.

The Roman Catholic Church in Porto Rico, as elsewhere, failed to give an interpretation of religion that emphasized its ethical and social demands.

The Protestant influence.—In accordance with American policy, the territorial government established public schools and began to work toward universal popular education. There are today almost 175,000 students in these public schools. This emphasis upon education left the evangelical churches free to devote their attention to that training in religion and morals that the island so sadly needed.

The action of Porto Rico in enacting prohibition by popular suffrage prior to the constitutional amendment in the United States, is sufficient evidence of the influence of Protestant Christianity.

METHODISM IN PORTO RICO

An important field.—The field assigned to the Methodist Episcopal Church comprises a broad strip of territory extending across the island.

In this Methodist territory live about one-third of the people of Porto Rico. The Methodist Episcopal Church is at work in 130 centers, in not one of which is there any other evangelical effort.

A Centenary achievement.—Everywhere the church is going forward. This has been graphically demonstrated during the Centenary period in the capital city of San Juan, where for years there has been need for a church building that would fitly house what has been conceded to be the best piece of church work that is being carried on by any Protestant body in that city. Church extension funds have made possible the erection of an edifice that is commanding attention and leading to an increased ministry on the part of this important society.

Trinity Church, San Juan, Porto Rico

Typical needs.—But with all that has been accomplished the work in Porto Rico must still be considered in terms of need rather than of accomplishment.

Arecibo, a city of 12,000 people on the north side of the island, has a church manned by the superintendent of the district and three helpers. The work has outgrown its quarters. The present parsonage is needed for religious education and social work. Then there must be a new parsonage. Then the church must be enlarged.

At Hatillo, a community of 1,500 people a little further west, is located the George O. Robinson Institute for boys. A little one-room, frame building of the cheapest sort of construction serves as a place of worship. The municipality has given generously to the support of the work. This fine school is in dire need of an adequate church building.

THE ADVANCE ON SANTO DOMINGO

A Centenary advance.—It may sound strange to say that the Methodist Episcopal Church, during the Centenary, undertook a new home missionary enterprise in a foreign country. Yet that is just what happened when, in 1920, work was opened in the city of Santo Domingo in the Dominican Republic. For this work is an offshoot of the Porto Rico work, and thus has naturally been directed as a home missionary enterprise. So do the distinctions between "home" and "foreign" blend into one another in these world-transforming days!

The board for Christian work.—One of the most significant experiments in modern missionary history underlies the advance of Protestantism into Santo Domingo. Four evangelical churches, with six societies, decided upon a united effort in the island. Then, instead of merely providing for a delimitation of territory, these societies organized and chartered the Board for Christian Work in Santo Domingo, and so, as one organic body, they are actually at work!

I. WHAT IS OUR BOARD OF FOREIGN MISSIONS?

1. NAME AND OBJECT

The name and object of the board are fixed by the General Conference. In the Discipline of 1920, paragraph 412, we find: "The name of this organization shall be the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Its objects are religious, philanthropic, and educational, designed to diffuse more generally the blessings of Christianity, by the promotion and support of all phases of church work and missionary activity in foreign countries; and also in such other places subject to the sovereignty of the United States, but not on the continent of North America or the islands adjacent thereto, as may be committed to the care of such organization by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, under such rules and regulations as said General Conference may from time to time prescribe."

2. THE FIELD

The field is the world and the Methodist Episcopal Church is not merely an American church, but is in the uttermost parts of the earth. Nevertheless, our church is not found in all countries. In some regions Methodism is at work under other names, as the Wesleyan Church in England, and the Methodist Church of Canada. On what is generally recognized as the foreign mission field many comity agreements have been entered into, for there would be chances for conflict and misunderstanding if every Protestant church should undertake to carry the gospel into every land. It has seemed the part of brotherliness and of efficiency in the great common task to recognize a distribution of forces in the foreign field by general agreements, and there are some countries, as, for example, Brazil and Egypt, where our church is not established and where the responsibility for evangelization is left with other Protestant denominations. Likewise within the different countries there are states or provinces where the Methodist Episcopal Church has clearly defined responsibilities, while other denominations take the responsibility in other areas.

Nevertheless, looking at a map of the world, one finds Methodism as represented by the Methodist Episcopal Church widely spread.

In all, our foreign mission work lies in fifty-three missions or conferences, and in forty countries. There are Methodists of every race and color, bound together by an effective organization as well as by the ties of a common faith.

4. DUTIES

The board is instructed by our church, through the General Conference, to take the responsibility of supervising the work of our missionaries and in general promoting the interests of the church on the foreign field. The Discipline of 1920, paragraph 411, reads:

"1. There shall be a Board of Foreign Missions, duly incorporated according to law, and having its office in New York City; said Board of Foreign Missions shall have committed to it the general supervision of all work in the foreign fields, and shall be subject to such rules and regulations as the General Conference from time to time may prescribe.

"2. Other denominational agencies shall undertake work in foreign lands only in co-operation with this board."

5. ORGANIZATION

a. The board is a corporation under the laws of the State of New York. In order to transact business, to hold property and execute deeds of trust, it is necessary that the board should be legally incorporated. A few of our universities and other union institutions in foreign lands have been separately incorporated, but in general all business on the foreign fields is done and all property held in the name of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church. As the indigenous church becomes stronger and more self-reliant, the title of property used for church purposes can be turned over to it, but in most instances it is still necessary for the Board of Foreign Missions to serve as the legal principal in business transactions.

b. The members of the board are elected by the General Conference every four years from ministers and laymen of the church representing the different sections of the country. Of the present board, twenty-three are pastors, two are district superintendents, seven are ordained ministers in general service, and thirty-two are lay members of the church. The bishops are ex-officio members, and Bishop Luther B. Wilson is president of the board.

c. The officers responsible for the administration of the board's affairs are the two corresponding secretaries, who select the staff and direct the business of the board, subject to the board and in harmony with the advice of its authorized committees.

d. Standing committees meet throughout the year to transact the details of business that cannot receive the attention of the board at its annual meeting. The board fixes the annual appropriations to the various missions, but there are emergency appropriations and special funds and interpretations of all kinds requiring attention throughout the year. The Executive, the Candidate, the Finance and the Administrative Committees meet monthly to attend to such matters and authorize necessary actions by the secretaries and the staff.

e. The organization of the church on the foreign fields is much as it is at home. There are annual conferences and mission conferences grouped now into areas for Episcopal supervision. The bishop or general superintendent exercises the same duties there as here in the matters of holding conference, making appointments, and otherwise adjusting the personnel of the field. The missionaries as well as the native workers receive their annual appointments from the presiding bishop. Missionaries who have been ordained to preach are usually members of the annual conference of their field. Before the conferences were organized, the missionaries in a given field constituted a "Mission." In the development of the national organization, mission conferences and annual conferences have been set up, sometimes including missionaries as well as the nationals. The mission, however, composed of the missionaries sent out by the board continues and works alongside of and with the conferences, retaining its organized relationship to the board in the missionary group units. When the time comes for a more complete organization of the workers in any field in matters of self-support and in normal conference and church organization, a changed relationship between the board and the representative unit on the field may well be effected.

In all fields where it is at work, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society maintains an organization as a part of the general missionary program.

We have therefore in each field—the counterpart of what we have in Korea: the Korea Annual Conference, and the Korea Mission; the former representing the local indigenous church, and the latter, a group of missionaries, representing the brotherly help of the church in America through the Board of Foreign Missions.

f. The missions on the field, and there are more than forty of them, must be organized to transact business. The Mission Treasurer is usually the board's official financial representative on the field. Annual or semi-annual meetings of the mission determine the general policies of the work within its field.

A finance committee of the mission nominated on the field and appointed by the board is responsible for all ad interim business and for all matters pertaining to money or property. Every survey estimate, every request for property or other special grant must be approved by the field Finance Committee. This rule is designed to insure an element of balance and continuity to the work on the field. If a missionary carrying an important bit of work is suddenly called from it by sickness or other cause, the Finance Committee will provide for the continuation of the work. The board looks to the Finance Committee to approve all proposals made from the field, and to carry out all proposals made from the homeland.

g. The foreign missionary is thrown largely on his own resources. His work is usually individualistic. Often he is a lone messenger; often he must be the message itself. The mind of the heathen world cannot comprehend Christ. The mere translation of words cannot always carry the gospel message. The missionary must live that message and his work is often based on his own personality.

Nevertheless, the affairs of the kingdom may not be risked by the uncertainties of the life of any one man. Reinforcements must be at hand. Those lone workers in foreign lands must be in some way knit together; they must see the common task and must work toward the common goal. They must have that connection with the church at home that enables them really to represent it out there, and that enables us to share with them the view of the task and the call for intercession.

The care for these matters of both spirit and method is the task which the church has assigned to the Board of Foreign Missions.

II. KINDS OF WORK

1. AT HEADQUARTERS

The accountants who make a business of auditing books for New York concerns say, that there are few commercial enterprises that have a business so complex as that of the Board of Foreign Missions. Income is varied and expenditure more so. A considerable part of the annual receipts is designated for special objects. The Division of Designated Income takes care annually of 30,000 gifts designated for particular fields and work. Not only must these 30,000 gifts be properly booked and forwarded, but the givers must be informed as to the use of their gifts, and the missionaries in charge abroad of the givers' wishes. In some instances, half a dozen letters will pass before the designation is arranged. The Department of Annuities and Bequests conducts a business as wide in its range as that of certain commercial concerns. Self-insurance against fire has been found profitable and a complete system of insurance accounts is in force. Special funds, such as China Famine Funds, India Mass Movement Funds, and European Relief Funds must be kept apart and carefully accounted, each almost as a separate business enterprise.

In the matters of expenditure there are over forty different missions to deal with in dozens of nations, each with its special money medium and financial system. Twelve hundred missionaries and 20,000 native workers are supported in full or in part together with their work. It is not a light task to direct and safeguard these expenditures.

2. ON THE FIRING LINE

On the field types of work are even more varied. Four major groups of work are generally recognized and the proposed budget which is published elsewhere in this volume, will be found to be divided along these lines evangelistic, educational, medical, and "other" work.

a. The evangelistic work is the fundamental aim of all our missionary effort. For the pioneer missionary it is almost his only work, with perhaps some exceptions in favor of the medical work. Livingstone crossed and recrossed Africa, made friends with the tribesmen, learned their tongues, and lived in their villages that he might tell the gospel story, and many another noble soul has gone out on the Lord's business that he might spread by direct contact with the un-Christianized races the story of love and hope.

Mackay, in his work in Formosa, began in the same way. After a number of years, he slackened these efforts to reach the masses of the people and adopted a policy of traveling about from place to place with a small group of converts. On them he concentrated his efforts, teaching them to present the story, aiming by this means to reach a much larger circle than he alone could ever touch. This is the second phase of the evangelistic work wherein the foreign missionary follows the example of Jesus in withdrawing from the crowd and committing the message to those whose hearts the Lord has moved.

The early disciples found it necessary to set apart certain deacons to look after the business of the church. So the missionaries on the field find that the whole task is not in calling the sheep into the fold, but that the flock, once gathered, must be shepherded and nurtured. As the membership grows, especially in such cases of rapid accessions as have occurred in the Mass Movement areas of India, the guiding of the native congregation in their problems has consumed much of the time of the foreign missionary. As more strong leaders are developed within the native church, it will be able to take care of itself, and more than this, we can confidently expect that it will contribute to the vitality of the Christian church throughout the whole world. The bread of life which we "cast upon the waters" will be returned to us many fold.

For the present, however, the burden of shepherding rests heavily upon the foreign workers and reinforcements are needed that there may be no failure in this respect, and that at the same time the work of direct evangelization and preacher training may go on. For this we cannot now depend on indigenous leadership.

b. The educational work of the church on the foreign field is quite different from that in the homeland. In America, it is largely confined to preparatory schools, colleges, and institutions of higher learning. The state and local governments provide popular education which fills the needs from the primary through high school grades. The church, with its institutions, supplements the public and private colleges and universities. The purpose is to provide proper environment for its young people when removed from their home influences, and to offer special lines of study, rather than to provide a better grade of instruction. On the mission field, the first task of the church is to provide a better grade of instruction. The church may be, in fact, the only institution giving any chance for education to the masses which it comes to serve, and schools of all grades, from kindergarten to university are administered under the Board of Foreign Missions.

"Education is power," and if we wish our newly-made converts in these uncivilized lands to become powerful advocates of the gospel, it is evident that we must pause in our evangelistic work long enough to plan for the education of the next generation in these Christian families.

In India, hundreds of village schools are today in session with no more shelter than that of the trees. In Africa, where the native clan life is often unfavorable to such work, the converts are gathered together in Christian communities and training centers where the boys and girls can be taught to think of life as something more than a wild tribal existence. In other places where the African youth are called together by the lure of wages at the mines, the missionaries come with night schools or special studies, endeavoring to throw around them an influence that they will counteract the awful effects of a civilization devoid of Christianity. In South America, the missionary is not greatly concerned with providing primary education, for extensive school systems are maintained by the governments; but he has found that the youth of these lands will come gladly and in great numbers to our high schools and boarding schools. These are in great favor, and are the most ready means of approach to the people of these nominally Catholic countries. In China, education has always been highly valued, but the type of education has been entirely insufficient for their modern needs. It is impossible for a nation to build up in one year an education of an entirely new type from that of the thousands of years that have preceded it. The change must be begun with the youngest child and grow along through a generation, and China is having inestimable help in this task from the Christian forces within that country.

Throughout the world there is scarcely a field in which our church is established where educational work does not occupy a large place in its plans and on its budgets.

c. The medical work includes hospitals, dispensaries and the itinerating services of the medical missionary. Up in the mountains of China, a prominent villager was being slowly choked to death by a tumor. Tiger bones and snake-skin concoctions were unavailing but it was a very simple matter for the foreign doctor to cut out the tumor and relieve the apparently doomed man. Is it any wonder that the missionaries were soon invited to open a church in that man's village, and that we now have a thriving congregation there?

Missionary physician at work in Africa

The most difficult tribe to reach in Africa finally gave way to the needs of medical aid. Wherever the church has gone it has carried the gospel of healing and of prevention. Medical work includes not only support of hospital and dispensaries, but also campaigning among the people for better habits and healthier ways of living.

d. The "other" work as represented on the foreign field is of many types. There are institutional and social centers in places of large population; orphanages, homes for lepers, and homes for the aged and other dependents. There are many items of general and miscellaneous work such as are found necessary in any project. Even here in the homeland where conditions are more stable and procedure more standardized, these items are essential to proper and efficient work. On the foreign field they are all the more so. Inland stations must be served by messengers; missionaries must be called together for regular conference and often for emergencies; new building work must be administered, and a hundred other items of a general nature that cannot be classed as evangelistic, educational, or medical, are grouped under this head of "other work." This section also includes the preparation and publishing of literature in dozens of languages and dialects and its distribution and sale over widespread areas, often difficult and even dangerous of access.

In all this variety of work, however, there is fundamentally the one purpose, and that is evangelism. The great motive of the workers on the field is a desire to bring men to a knowledge of the Christ, and the policy of the work is determined primarily by this desire.

III. WHEREUNTO WE HAVE ARRIVED

1. GROWTH IN MEMBERSHIP

The progress of the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church on the foreign field is encouraging, as this curve of membership during the past sixty years will show:

When we note the "few that be saved" and the countless peoples yet untouched by the gospel message, we may lose heart. But faith comes in and we see Jesus, with a mere handful of followers, proposing to draw all men unto Himself. Faith, however, is sometimes hindered and sometimes helped by a study of the cold, hard facts. Surely, in this case the sharp upgrade of the membership curve should stimulate us and we can thank God and take courage, because of this evidence of healthy vigor.

2. COMPARATIVE STATISTICS

Study the comparative statistics as to the status of the work now and as it was when we first faced the Centenary task. It is impossible to show the full measure of increase in responsibility that has come to the Board of Foreign Missions since in September, 1917, it received approval for its Centenary program from the historic conference at Niagara Falls.

In Table A (below), there is contrasted the present condition of the life of the Methodist Episcopal Church outside the United States with the condition as reported by the Board of Foreign Missions in 1917, in so far as statistics can give it. No tables of figures can give a picture of the transformations of human life, nor can the contribution of the spirit of Jesus Christ to the social, economic, religious, and political developments of the peoples of the world be measured by mathematics.

3. SELF-SUPPORT

Table B shows the rate of increase in self-support by different parts of the church.

Added point is given the call for a new world program by the realization that our Methodist Episcopal Church is now at

4. OTHER INCREASES IN SUMMARY

The following further increases since the Niagara Falls meeting are significant:

In annual disbursements by the Board of Foreign Missions, an increase of.....	187%
In property valuations on the foreign field, an increase of	80%
In number of missionaries, an increase of.....	28%
In number of native workers, an increase of.....	52%
In number of Christian community, an increase of	51%
In number of schools, an increase of.....	5%
In number of students, an increase of.....	34%

Some of these increases are cause for unalloyed rejoicing. Others, such as the disparity between the increase in educational facilities and in the Christian community for which we are responsible, point with stern clearness to certain features of our future program that must receive primary attention.

IV. THE TASK WE FACE TODAY ON THE FOREIGN FIELD

1. IN GENERAL

a. The task is ours.—A hundred years ago, there were saintly men who seriously combatted the idea that we should “interfere in God’s plan for the heathen.” Honest souls felt that we must first do more “in Jerusalem.” Doubtful ones said that the heathen would never listen to the gospel and that God never intended that we should send men out to be killed and eaten. But men went, and men came back, and the reports which they brought were full of promise. Since that time, the foreign mission enterprise has taken a large place in the thought of the church.

We must continue and enlarge our efforts for the non-Christian world. The dismal prophecies of a century ago found fulfilment in a few instances, but are unsupported by the general history of missions. The later promises of wholesale ingatherings into the kingdom came true in certain districts, a village and a clan here and there, but we have discovered that on the foreign field, as elsewhere, the kingdom must grow gradually, like the mustard seed of the parable. We, today, can look forward with more assurance than our predecessors. We have not only the same Bible that they had, the same Word of Promise from the same God of Power, but we have the benefits of their experience to build upon, and we have the encouragement that is found in the records of their work.

The membership chart which we have already studied has for us other lessons than the mere encouragement of its upward trend. There are two things that are worthy of note.

The church on the foreign field, these statistics tell us, has doubled its membership in ten years. The church in the homeland has doubled its membership in thirty-four years. We dare not, in the face of these figures, halt our work of planting the gospel in these lands where it has flourished so notably. The foreign missionary work has proven a most profitable use of our church’s resources.

The second fact brought out by these figures is that the rate of increase on the foreign field, while still much greater than we have attained at home, has been decreasing during the last few decades. It is to be expected that the river will not flow as swiftly as the mountain torrent; that it will take longer to grow from 2,000,000 to 4,000,000 members than it did to grow from 200 to 400. At the same time, we must recognize other possible reasons for the falling off in the rate of increase.

The anti-Christian forces are aroused as never before. The non-Christian religions are showing new vigor and increased opposition. Mohammedanism is sweeping across Africa. Buddhism and Shintoism are taking on the cloak of philanthropy and striving to revive the ancient reverence for their gods. Intense nationalism is arrayed against the progress of “the foreign religion.” World-wide atheism flaunts the failure of Christendom in its political dealings as the failure of Christianity. These conditions if rightly met need not affect our rate of increase, but the fact remains that the Church of Christ is facing in most Christian lands such opposition as it has never before known, and the foreign enterprises on which the church has embarked may not be lightly forsaken in these days of onslaught.

THE CROSS AT ITS BEST IN MISSION LANDS

b. Future promise.—The great reach of the task is before and not behind us. The native church, full of promise as it is, is nevertheless an infant. We find much to encourage us in the upward trend of membership totals. At the same time, if we are wise, we shall take the membership curve on page 426, as the measure of our accomplishment, and shall set it up against the picture of the task yet undone, as shown in the chart on this page. We must not deceive ourselves; the great task lies still ahead. Since God has made of us a people great and powerful and well equipped with worldly means, we must face the question as to what He expects us to do.

2. THE MANY MINISTRIES

a. "Preach the gospel."—Many have never heard it. Many never will hear it except as we preach it. Look for example at the Moradabad District in the North India Conference, as indicated by the chart at the top of this page.

Considerably more than half our 600,000 converts are found in India alone. India is one of our best fields, and Moradabad District is among the best half dozen of the sixty-three districts in India. Here we have 14,000 church members, but there are 1,500,000 people yet unreached by the gospel message. This district is one of those from which other denominations have withdrawn. No other Protestant church will enter. Here we alone are responsible, and this situation is duplicated many times in India and in other lands. For fully 50,000,000 people in foreign lands throughout the world we bear this peculiar responsibility. Except as we preach it, they never will hear the gospel. "And how shall they preach, except they be sent?"

b. "Teach all nations."—In every nation it seems there are occasional men, who, like Cornelius the centurion, have held communion with God without having heard or understood the plan of salvation. They with eagerness accept the gospel story. With others, the vision comes only through long contact with the ideas of Christianity and for these the schools are the ideal medium for planting in their minds the idea of a God of love. Education is the handmaiden of evangelism and one of the first aims in educational work on the mission field was the great opportunity it presented to supplement the preaching of the Word.

Usually when a convert from the foreign field tells his experience, it is a story of one who first came from curiosity, was puzzled and distrustful, returned again and again, inquired more and more diligently, and finally found his Lord. A definite period of cultivation seems necessary in most cases and here is where the schools come in to help the evangelist.

Not only do they supplement evangelism, but often make way for it. The Anglo-Chinese College at Foochow receives 200 students each year. More than half of them come from non-Christian homes and many of the boys come with stern warnings to beware of listening to any of the foreign doctrines. It is a remarkable thing that nearly all of these boys become Christians before they graduate and the acquaintance made in the school with missionaries and native Christians opens the way for visits to their homes, often ending in the conversion of parents and friends.

The educational task is really a privilege. Can you look at this little Korean lad without feeling kindly toward him, and wishing him the best things that life may have in store for him? To be allowed to help the bright-faced boys and girls, through education, into a world of wider usefulness and into a greater enjoyment of life, is our privilege.

Then there rests on us the obligation to give to our new-found brethren in India and Africa and China those opportunities for their children which we enjoy for ours. The heathen world is ignorant and depressed. Education is the ladder out of the pit for them. An Indian beggar, one of the outcastes, living near the summer camp of the missionaries, was won by the gospel story. His only request, and one made with such persistence that it could not be denied, was that his four boys might be taken into the mission school. Only two could be taken then. Later the other two were received. Today they are all men of prominence and esteem, instead of outcastes in their communities. Two of them are in positions of great responsibility in the government service. Without the church and its schools they would today be mere scavengers back in the foothills of India. The sad thing is that the church, with the meagre funds given for this work, has been unable to provide this opportunity for more than a fraction of its children. In foreign lands there are to be educated fully 800,000 children of our church families. More than half of these are entirely dependent on the church for their education. Our facilities are inadequate to receive them. We would have to triple our number of schools and teachers, and then crowd out all of that educational work for non-Christians, which has already been described as so rich in promise of reward.

get a

Take an average district in China as here shown and consider where we stand. Look at this great circle of opportunity. Extend it as much as you please to cover the great privilege of helping little tads by education into a wider world and a fuller life; and then compare the narrow strip of what we have actually done, and be convinced that this generation has not yet done its duty by the children beyond the seas.

c. "Heal the sick."—The three aspects of the educational work—opportunity, privilege, and obligation, are just as much present, and more distinctly emphasized in the medical work. What Christian can view human suffering without feeling a desire to help? Even non-Christians in America have been moved to contribute for the relief of physical suffering of the great masses of the uncivilized world. Were there in our hearts no other motive than a mere humanitarian one, we would have to provide medical missions, and we must as a people do far better or be condemned as a selfish and heartless generation. So much for the privilege.

The opportunity is self-evident. Jesus found the blind man not a subject for discussion and theorizing. The man was blind. He said, "that the word of God might be glorified." The man was before them as an opportunity, and all other considerations were beside the case. So the millions of sufferers in Asia and Africa stand before us as an opportunity and a challenge "that the word of God may be glorified." Talk as we may of pauperizing folks by giving to them too freely, we ourselves never feel pauperized because our hospitals in America are with few exceptions heavily subsidized. Our medical work in foreign lands, striking as it is in contrast with the blackness of its surroundings, is but a beginning.

Then there rests upon us the obligation as a church to give to our own in foreign lands the same chance to live and enjoy existence that has been vouchsafed to us by our Christian civilization. A church member's wife in India has a sick child. We tell her and her husband that their native doctors mislead them with superstition and with disgusting and dangerous practices. We destroy their faith in the native doctors, and all too often we do no more. We would cry out in protest and anguish of heart if we had not more outlook for our sick children than we are granting to that church member's wife in India this year. From Africa and China the same cry is heard from Christian homes—"May we not share in your blessings?"

An average district in China

For every Christian home in these lands there are a hundred or more homes where neither the gospel of love nor of healing has entered. Jesus said, "Preach the gospel, heal the sick," and "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye have done it unto Me."

The world awaits our response.—A survey of the opportunities is staggering. Let none say that the task is well along, or that we have done all that could be expected of us. What do these figures of the extent of our enterprise mean when cast up against our measurable resources? Four millions of us are sending out 1,200 missionaries; that is to say, 3,300 Christians are busy keeping one representative on the foreign field, and is that, in the face of these great needs, the best we can do?

V. THE WORLD SERVICE SURVEY

The great task is still before us. A general outlook of the world field and a review of the record of "whereunto we have attained" convinces us of that fact. The Centenary surveys which, at the time they were made, were a remarkable summing up of the church's task, are now at least seven years old. Many of them were made before our entry into the World War, and are rendered obsolete by new conditions, as well as by the lapse of time. The question arises as to what we shall do at the close of the Centenary period.

When the call was made upon the Council of Boards for a resurvey of each department of the church's task, the Board of Foreign Missions passed on the call to each of the missions and conferences on the foreign field, supplying them with such instructions and helps as were considered necessary to procure a unified form of statement. The church should be grateful to its over-burdened workers for the many days and nights of thoughtful discussion and compilation necessary to produce a statement of this character. We have, as the result, the most complete and extensive statement ever produced of our work and a wealth of information that will not only be of interest to the church, but will also greatly assist in the administration of the fields.

In general, the surveys were prepared by the missionaries in charge of the work. In every case, however, the final responsibility has rested with the Finance Committee of the mission, and the approval of its secretary was required on each survey return, as was also the approval of the bishop in charge.

These returns represent largely the concerted and balanced judgment of nearly 1,200 workers, our representatives on the outposts of the kingdom. The officers of the Board of Foreign Missions have given them intensive study and attempted to adjust the differences and to provide for evident irregularities. Thus the result combines the message of our ambassadors abroad and the convictions of our administrators at home.

All correspondence with the field, and all instructions concerning survey matters emphasized the necessity of keeping to a moderate and rational program growing out of our current work. The estimates of needs, presented elsewhere in this volume, as modified and accepted by the Council of Boards as the "Approved Needs" of the Board of Foreign Missions totals $12,015,000. It does not represent a program of what we could be doing, or what we should be doing on the foreign field. It is not a program of the church's full responsibility in the lands overseas, but a statement of what is the next step from our present level on the way to better things.

VI. WHAT OUR CHURCH SHOULD DO IN FOREIGN MISSIONS IN THE NEXT TEN YEARS

With such a varied field the only way we can study a ten-year program to advantage is to cover the ground country by country. Nevertheless there are several general matters for which a definite policy must be set up.

1. RELIEF AND PENSIONS

Relief and pensions.—For retired missionaries or dependents a sum of $60,000 is required out of each year's income. We have 1,200 adult missionaries and the physical strain is severe. Over 140 are now receiving pensions or grants for relief. Many of our missionaries are laymen. Most of the missionary preachers have their conference relationship abroad. These Conferences are financially weak and there is no adequate Conference Claimants' Fund to care for the retired ministers and none for the many laymen who are missionaries. The Board of Foreign Missions has had to meet the obligations out of the annual missionary collections. It would be more fitting to have this charge met from a special fund and it is desired within the next ten years to create an endowment of $2,000,000 producing an annual revenue of $100,000, which is about what the pensions and relief costs will amount to at the end of the ten-year period.

2. RESERVE FUND

An operating reserve fund.—The other outstanding need for "General Operations." From such a reserve, funds can be drawn to carry the year's work while the treasury waits for the collections to come in from the churches. Also it is needed to steady up our fluctuation in receipts so that a falling off in expected income during any year need not mean plunging the board into debt, nor drastic re-adjustments that hurt the work. The reserves should be maintained at about twenty-five per cent of the yearly budget and it is proposed to apply two per cent of the budget each year for these purposes.

3. CHINA

Education in favor.—When we undertake work in China we find that the old injunction to "be all things to all men" means that we will emphasize education. Though comparatively rare it is highly revered among the Chinese. Christianity comes with the message that education is for all and not alone for a few.

Primary education.—Our program for the next ten years contemplates tripling our facilities for primary education, partly as a means of reaching non-Christian homes, but more especially to provide a primary education for at least one out of three of the children of our Christian families.

Universities and theological schools.—The four great Union Universities in China in which Methodism has a share should be provided with sufficient buildings to keep pace with their increasing enrolment. Likewise we must insure adequate provision for the operating expenses of each of these Universities. The high-grade theological schools which now have their beginning in each of the four major areas of our work in China should be strengthened and brought to a point where they will fulfill their avowed purpose in the training of the highest type of prophetic and spiritual leadership. Ten or twelve Biblical Training Schools of lower grade will also be maintained. The educational program is not only an opportunity to meet the Chinese temperament but is also essential in this training of leadership for the future conduct of our Christian enterprises.

Hospitals.—Our ten hospitals should be strengthened both by additional staff and equipment, and an equal number of new minor medical centers opened.

Evangelism.—Direct evangelism will not be neglected but the great Jubilee Movement largely under native leadership is expected to stimulate the whole life of the Chinese Church and we shall make notable advances in the hitherto untouched communities.

New territory.—Distinct areas of new territory are proposed to be opened in Central China, areas where for some time our responsibility has been recognized but for which it has been impossible to make any financial provision for adequate entry. These areas, however, are comparatively small and the great task will be the intensive cultivation of those areas wherein we have already entered.

4. JAPAN

Evangelism and the social gospel.—Buddhism and Shintoism in Japan are fast taking over the Christian ideas and ideals of service and making these things a part of their campaign to recover their threatened prestige. Big sums of money are made available by their devotees for such campaigns. The Japan Methodist Church is a comparative infant among these long established religious organizations and can not be left to cope alone with this situation. There is great opportunity for us to work through the Japan Methodist Church in putting on a program of direct evangelism and the spreading of the social gospel. This situation should be met in a much more commanding way during the next ten years than has so far been found possible.

A trained Christian leadership.—The Japanese Government has learned well the value of primary education and made it compulsory for all children. We can not, however, expect to train Christian leadership through the medium of Japanese Government schools and the three or four higher schools that we maintain must be kept at a high state of efficiency to meet the competition of Government schools and also to provide the material essential to our leadership.

5. KOREA

Strengthen our centers.—Korea has had somewhat the same problems as Japan. The Korean Church is very active and aggressive in evangelistic matters and should be strongly supported in its activities. Our program contemplates the maintenance of interest in the Chosen Christian College as a strong center for higher Christian education, and in the Union Theological Seminary for the direct training of Christian workers. The work of Severance Union Medical College should also be strengthened as a means of training those who must serve our ever-growing Christian constituency with medical skill.

Extension work.—The extension of the Korean and Chinese work in Manchurian fields is also proposed as a definite part of the program of these ten years and the significant thing is that this program will be largely supported and carried on by the Chinese and Korean Christians with occasional help from the church in America.

6. PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Expanding the rim of church work.—Our churches now organized in the Philippine Islands are fast becoming self-supporting. Nevertheless there is always a rim of new churches as we advance into new fields that must be supported, and although our church in the Philippine Islands has attained self-support probably more rapidly than in any other field we occupy we do not forget that there is still much ground to be covered. During the next ten years we should triple our contributions toward the furtherance of gospel work, although practically every church that is today receiving support will then be carrying its own budget.

The Filipino Methodists have as a rule built their own churches but they have been necessarily flimsy and inadequate structures, in keeping with the small financial ability of the members. Government and commercial interests are rapidly introducing improved types of buildings throughout the islands and our type of church building must also be improved. Some aid will be necessary to local congregations and we should invest $25,000 each year (a small figure indeed) for the next ten years in aiding the dozens of small congregations, and occasionally large and important city groups, to secure these better buildings for their work.

Dormitories.—In general, good educational facilities are provided by the American Government, and our mission does not compete with the government in education. Hundreds of thousands of students, however, leave home to attend high schools, technical schools, normal schools and universities. One missionary writes: "There are at present over 2,000 students in the high school at Lingayen with no regular dormitory facilities. They are crowded in private homes and subject to uncomfortable and unsanitary conditions. The same condition prevails in Bayombong. The school there is not so large, yet is growing rapidly, and it would be well if we could get our dormitory established early."

We have three or four such dormitories now and we should put up a new one each year for the next ten years just to meet the urgent situations. Another missionary writes of the Manila dormitory: "At 6:30 every morning all the students are required to attend chapel at which a passage of Scripture is read with comments setting forth some truth for the day. Then comes a song in which they all join most heartily, as they do at the close of the morning's prayer in the Lord's Prayer. We follow up this work with personal interviews. Many come desiring only a good place in which to live and many are prejudiced against Protestantism, but the moral atmosphere of the institution is fine and most of the students, in the end, become converted and unite with our church."

In the matter of expense, these dormitories pay their own way. We should not delay to build them at all important provincial centers and provide the missionaries to carry on this promising work.

7. MALAYSIA

Immigrant opportunities. — Thousands upon thousands of immigrants from China and from southern India stream through the ports of Malaysia every year. Our evangelistic work lies almost wholly among these people, and also with certain Malay Mohammedan groups at points along the coast. The fact that we have work in China and India forms a point of contact with the immigrant populations; for, some bring their church connections with them, and many have known of our work in their homelands. Our policy during the next ten years will be steadily to develop this highly important work.

Many of these churches will become self-supporting during these ten years. One whole district, in fact, is proposing to ask the mission for only one-third of the aid it now receives. In other sections, there are many new churches to be opened requiring outside support because of the unsettled life of the immigrants. On the whole we should largely increase our activities in planting the church in these new born communities, and to this end the ten-year program calls for a tripling of the present missionary staff.

Contacts in education.—Our educational work in Malaysia is carried on in close co-operation with the British Colonial Government, which makes liberal grants for the building and maintenance of our schools. By this arrangement we are enabled to influence for Christ thousands of youth who would not otherwise come within the sound of the Christian message.

The schools we have already established have been very successful. The one at Penang has over 1,500 students. The tuition fees and government aid pay practically all the expenses of the school and in many cases pay also the salaries of the missionary teachers. These schools have far outgrown their facilities, however, and we must provide them with more adequate quarters in which to carry on their work. Not only this, but for every one school we have opened there are four or five others that we should open within the next ten years. These will require aid from the home church in providing the plant and in carrying the operating expenses for the first few years. Thereafter they will become permanent centers for the propagation of gospel truths.

8. NETHERLANDS INDIES

A medical opportunity.—Perhaps the greatest opportunity in the Netherlands Indies is medical work carried on in co-operation with the government. By an arrangement the government makes large grants to the building and maintenance of these plants and allows them to be run entirely as mission institutions. They therefore form bases for all lines of Christian activity as well as provide a much needed ministry of healing to those vast populations in the East Indies Islands. Two or three first-class schools should be maintained for the training of Christian boys, and one good Normal and Preachers' Training school established. Direct evangelistic advances should be made towards the almost untouched native populations in the interior of the Islands of Sumatra and Dutch Borneo. This involves the gradual enlargement of the staff and the securing of property and erection of proper buildings for the varied types of work.

9. INDIA

An intensive task.—Although the waves of the Mass Movement break upon us with their constant intensity, and although the urge for an expanding work is still laid heavily upon us, the program for the next ten years will lay the supreme emphasis upon the intensive development of areas already occupied, rather than upon further wide extension of our borders. It is recognized that no truly successful advance work can be carried on until we have wisely consolidated the great gains from the Mass Movement of recent years. Intensive instruction and training for these new converts is necessary and will require a doubling of our efforts and activities. Training schools and training conferences will be emphasized. A staff of several educational specialists is planned to correlate our various educational enterprises and to relate them more definitely to this great task of the education of a church.

Because our work lies mostly among the lower castes, the average church member in India is very poor. Self-support grows steadily though slowly, and as soon as one place becomes self-supporting, two or three new places will be opened. If we rely solely on what financial support these native Christians can give to the work, progress will be slow indeed. It seems reasonable to plan that the church in America should, for the next ten years, double its gifts towards gospel preaching in India. During this period we should provide 600 or 700 small preaching places or circuit centers for this work, costing anywhere from $500 to $5,000 each, and we should plan each year to provide one or more city plants in the twelve large cities within the area of our occupation.

Primary schools.—Nothing will do more to preserve the Mass Movement gains than the extension of our primary educational system to include the children of these homes. The whole problem of finding better teachers, better equipment, and better supervision for this work requires double the attention we have given to it in the past.

We now have about 400 village schools and propose to add 600 more during these ten years. Practically all of these are now out-of-door schools, and many of them are so poorly equipped that the government will not recognize them. We hope to erect each year thirty-five day school buildings at a cost of about $1,000 each. This is a modest program for our great need but if we can carry it through successfully it will be a wonderful encouragement to our native Christians, as well as a great blessing to the children.

The English Theological College.—Within the past year has been launched a new All-India English Theological College of the higher grade for candidates for our ministry, who are able to receive their advanced training in English. We have all these years had no provision for helping these men of higher educational qualifications for participation in our task of evangelism and the next ten years must see this school equipped and staffed on an adequate scale.

Hospital extension.—We have too long relied on the government hospitals for the medical work in these fields. Our church is spread largely among the village folk whom the city hospitals cannot adequately serve. We now have three hospitals in operation, and plan to have in each of our conference areas by 1934 one central hospital with several outlying dispensaries for each, and provision for an itinerant dispensary service to cover these heavily populated districts in order to relieve suffering and make an entry for the gospel of love. In addition, we are establishing and must adequately develop the All-India Tuberculosis Sanitarium at Madar, near Ajmere, in the Rajputana desert.

10. AFRICA

Training centers.—Our chief endeavor in Africa will be in the building up of five or six strong training centers. The experience of the past fifty years has taught us that scattered small scale operations in Africa will not make headway against the great mountain of native ignorance and superstition and against the advance of Mohammedanism. A handy man or two for these institutions will not suffice. We must in the next ten years put half a dozen specialists in these centers. Farming and industrial methods must be studied as well as taught. A new economic and social order must be found for these peoples who come to us and our training work in Africa must be taken up vigorously and promptly.

In mining regions.—In the mining regions there is a peculiar opportunity to reach the floating population of mine workers through education and social features. Our program at Elisabethville and Johannesburg contemplates extensive operations along these lines under the direct supervision of specialists in religious education and work with men and boys.

More adequate medical work.—In medical work we have scarcely begun to occupy our African fields. The three existing hospitals have a most meager equipment. In ten years they should be modestly but adequately housed and staffed and five new medical centers opened, for the need of Christlike ministration is great beyond words.

New mission stations.—Several areas in Africa with large populations have been hitherto practically untouched by Christian missions. They live in the path of the Mohammedan advance and we should bear a share of the responsibility of out-posting these lands with Christianity. Our ten year estimate contains provision for the establishing of these mission stations within such new areas if the conferences on Africa proposed for the coming year indicate that such is a wise course to pursue.

11. SOUTH AMERICA

School expansion.—Our Methodist schools for the Latin youth of South America are much in favor and the expense of this operation is largely met from the student income, in some cases an annual profit being regularly shown. These schools do much to break down the prejudice against Protestantism on the one hand and against all religious institutions on the other. They offer large and important contacts where the leaven of the gospel word should be performing its office. We will in the ten years expand these operations by eighty or ninety per cent.

The Indian appeal.—Our work among the vast Indian population has just begun. It is an adventure of strong missionary appeal and worthy of the church's thought and support. These Indians are lightly touched by the Latin civilizations of the land, and need our help through medical missions and fundamental educational facilities, as well as in the preaching of the gospel message. These people of mysterious history and wonderful capacity for development have through years of repression lost heart in the task of self-improvement and it may be our privilege in these ten years in some measure to carry to them the gospel of hope and uplift.

Better church and school plants.—All of our properties in South America are insufficient to our task and mean in comparison with secular buildings and the church properties of other fields. Some of our important schools and many church services are conducted in unsuitable rented quarters. A large percentage of the better class of Latin Americans despise religion and churches as they have known them, and where religions are counted scarcely respectable we need something better than our makeshift plants to do an effective work. It is proposed in the next ten years to make possible better plants for our more important centers of work both in churches and in schools.

Our responsibility.—We have been working in Mexico for 50 years, and because of the large Indian population will probably have to continue for 50 years more. There are four million people in the territory assigned to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The theological school and a hospital must be developed and have their own properties. A considerable investment will still be necessary in the Aztecas social center in Mexico City, and similar institutions must be started in at least four other cities. Assistance will have to be given either in the erection of new buildings, or reconstruction of older churches in a hundred smaller centers. For at least twenty-five years a great deal of attention and some considerable investment will have to be made in primary schools until the state can furnish free public schools throughout the Republic.

A literature program with its printing plant, book store, and weekly paper must be subsidized and the program enlarged for meeting with good literature the demand now being made by this rapidly developing people for reading material. Increased investments must be made in our plants in the four large educational institutions. Considerable help must be given to congregations in cities ranging from 50,000 to 200,000 where fine churches must be erected. The hospital at Guanajuato must be further developed and a larger investment made in the union hospital in Puebla. Medical work should also be opened in Queretaro and Pachuca to take care of large centers of population.

13. COSTA RICA

New missionaries.—In addition to the district superintendent, two evangelistic missionaries are to be established in leading centers in Costa Rica for constant itinerating work throughout the country, with an additional missionary family to work among the Indians on the border between Costa Rica and Panama.

Educational needs.—The small Bible Training School now under the district superintendent, will be developed into a theological seminary, and must train both men and women workers. The primary school in the capital of San Jose must have its own building and should develop into a fine secondary institution with a junior college as the ultimate goal. The fine normal school at Heredia should have both a boys' and girls' dormitory with American missionaries in charge.

Developing the church.—Special attention must be given to the West Indian negroes and other workers on the large banana plantations. Large churches must be built and conducted in the four leading cities, and smaller churches in at least 25 other towns. While the people are much farther along than in Panama, we cannot expect complete evangelization of the Republic and the establishment of a self-supporting church in less than twenty-five years, and possibly not for fifty years.

14. PANAMA

Our peculiar responsibility.—Our work in Panama for the past three years has been conducted principally in Panama City, with one provincial station at David. Work has been opened in Chitre, and other parts of the Republic have been visited. As our Board is solely responsible for the evangelization of Panama, we propose to establish preaching places and churches in every province, and also among the San Blas Indians. Work among the West Indians is left largely to the Wesleyans and Baptists.

An educational program.—Our Panama College, now a primary school, must be extended to cover secondary work and eventually a junior college. The Training School in connection with the Sea Wall Church must become a theological school. A large institutional church is planned for the principal plaza in Panama City. Nurses will be added to the mission stations throughout the Republic and a medical missionary will be employed for itinerating work. The interior portion of the Republic is so backward that mission work will have to continue for many years to come.

15. EUROPE

Influence of war.—The policy of the Board of Foreign Missions in promoting the interests of the Church and the Kingdom in Europe has been profoundly influenced by the war.

An emergency.—The definite consideration of the principles and practice of self-support as affecting both missionary funds and the permanent relation of the Methodism of continental Europe to the Methodist Episcopal Church, was halted; consultations were left incomplete, and conclusions were not formulated. For the time the European problem became one of emergency in which the Board reckoned with new factors which suddenly appeared. Both the physical and mental map of Europe were changed. Gradually, however, there is emerging a certain order of events and of thinking which should put us again upon the track of a program thoroughly thought through and acceptable to Methodism on both sides of the sea.

Prompt relief.—The demand for prompt physical relief both for our own members in Europe and for other sufferers from the war required prompt and generous action in the period, 1918-1920. This demand came as definitely from the church at home as from the sufferers in the lands directly affected by the war. Provision had been made in the program of the Centenary for an addition of $2,500,000 annually to the original askings for the Board of Foreign Missions in order that these requirements for immediate relief and for reconstruction might be met. This made it possible for the Methodist Episcopal Church to be the first Christian organization of America to reach with resources in money and supplies the hungry and destitute in Europe. Over $1,200,000 was used in this immediate relief. The money was not in hand but the church had pledged it and pledged it for this purpose. Had the board received even seventy per cent of its expected income, this amount would not now be carried as a debt.

National changes.—The changes caused by the war have adjusted the former boundaries and have brought new states into being. The Baltic Mission is established, covering the three new republics, Latvia, Esthonia, Lithuania. Austria-Hungary is no longer a dual field, it has become two units. Yugo-Slavia embraces a part of Hungary and takes in a part of Macedonia for which our Mission has an important responsibility. Russia, always a problem, is now a problem raised to the *n*th power. Albania still awaits our help. The war has thrown up into relief the religious groupings. There is a new Protestant situation, where the state church has been disestablished. As never before our church confronts with sharp distinction, the Roman Catholic Church, the Orthodox Greek Church, Mohammedanism and sheer materialistic atheism. In outline and content the problems of continental Europe, as seen from the Methodist viewpoint, with all that is old in them, are new and compelling.

Comity.—By agreement, accepted by our own Board and by our General Conference, acted upon but not officially adopted by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the countries of Europe, so far as work in them by our two churches is concerned, are distributed as follows:

Methodist Episcopal Church: Scandinavia, North and North Central Russia, Baltic Republics, Germany, Switzerland, France, Spain, Italy, Austria, Hungary, the Balkans.

Methodist Episcopal Church, South: Belgium, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, South and South Central Russia.

This division adds to territory occupied by our Church in 1914, Spain, Yugo-Slavia, and parts of the Baltic Provinces, and takes from it our very limited work in Poland. The fact of this understanding between these two great branches of American Methodism adds to the responsibility of each.

In the proposal for an appropriation basis for 1924-1925 these general facts are held in mind. They become also influential factors in outlining the policy of Methodism in Europe in the coming years. The Board has instructed its Committee on policy and work in Europe to prepare and present at its meeting in November, 1923, a report on our European work with a view to recommendations to the General Conference of 1924.

General policy.—With no attempt at close financial estimates beyond 1924-25, the general policy would include:

1. For Protestant Europe, continued aid in securing suitable property and equipment, maintenance subsidies while work is being stabilized, promotion of self-support, and cessation of financial support, except in the case of central educational or philanthropic units, well within the ten year period.

2. Clearer definition of our responsibility in Latin countries, co-operating with existing churches, establishing our own units of work at important centers, holding American representatives to a minimum, and developing and training the nationals themselves for the leadership and support of a Methodism for each land with international relations and obligations. For some countries the contributions should be increased and then for a time maintained; in others, within a reasonable time, there should be gradual reduction, the institutional work receiving consideration upon its merit as it develops.

3. Increased responsibility must be assumed in the Balkans, in Austria, and in Hungary, in the Baltic republics, and especially in Russia, where the financial provision should be enlarged fivefold in the near future. A strong program should be maintained in North Africa, which for purposes of administration, is classified with Europe, since there our church alone occupies the field, and the contacts with Mohammedanism offer opportunities nowhere else afforded.

In most of these fields a large property program is inevitable. Until a resource-constituency is secured, the cost of adequate property for theological training schools, orphanages and churches, especially in important centers, cannot be borne by the nationals themselves. Urgency to secure the self-supporting basis for the going work must in Europe as elsewhere be accompanied by a generous consideration of the need of co-operation for housing and equipping the work.

VII. CONCLUSION

If in this statement we have marred the Master's program, we are confident that the flaw will be revealed, the error corrected. The currents of missionary sympathy belt the globe. We find ourselves thinking in terms of other lands, of workers in far away fields. Let them speak to the church at home. They are shepherding the little flock scattered among all the great alien peoples of the world. The growing churches are gathered into fifty conferences. They look out upon populations where 99½ per cent are still unevangelised. They are set to the task of teaching and of healing them. It is theirs to conquer error with truth, superstition with faith, sin with holiness. In Jesus Christ are their power and their recompense. As someone has said they promote a Kingdom which is without frontiers. Where hindrances are greatest, confidence is most firm. They follow the world's Master, they have faith in God, they trust the Church. They and we know that it is morning and not eventide.

In this statement we and they are drawing a new line not as a line at which to end but as one from which afresh to start.

What the world has been waiting for through the centuries is a sample Christian nation. America has the best chance of being that sample.

I. HISTORICAL STATEMENT

1. MISSIONARY SOCIETY

The first society.—Organized missions in the Methodist Episcopal Church began with the adoption of the following at a public meeting held in the Bowery Church, New York City, April 5, 1819;

“Resolved: That it is expedient for this meeting to form a Missionary and Bible society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.”

In the first constitution the society was called “The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America.” “In America” was eliminated in 1828 to permit a future work overseas, although at that time the revised charter declared that the society was “for the express purpose of enabling several Annual Conferences more effectually to extend their missionary labors throughout the United States and elsewhere, and also to assist in the support and promotion of missionary schools.” The General Conference of 1840 added “in our own and in foreign countries.”

“Domestic operations.” — The present Board of Home Missions and Church Extension did not come into existence until 1907. Previous to that time the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church had jurisdiction over all missionary work, both at home and abroad. In early days missionary outposts on the American frontier were referred to and managed as “foreign” missions, but for purposes of clearness and study we should adopt the quaint term which gradually crept into the general usage of the church, “Domestic operations of our Missionary Society.”

By 1881, domestic missions were of two kinds: those administered by a board of managers included Arizona, Black Hills, Dakota, Indian Territory, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, and Nebraska, and those administered by the conference were missions to the Aborigines, Welsh, Germans, Scandinavians, French, and Chinese; also needy points of forty-six Annual Conferences, most of which were on the frontiers or in the South.

The first missionary.—It is surprising what changes came during the life-time of the first missionary, Rev. Ebenezer Brown, who was appointed in 1819 by Bishop George to labor among the French in New Orleans. Fourteen years changed an Indian’s happy hunting ground to a well-established community. Mr. Brown went to work in the year when the missionary society was organized. When he died in 1889, the receipts of this society had grown to a million dollars a year.

A justified endeavor.—With true insight the early missionary society established outposts of evangelism in sparsely settled regions and waited for the population to fill in the intervening places. During these years the field was entered, a system of management developed, policies decided upon, tested and readjusted until finally the missionary society, which had been opposed on the floor of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1820 and denounced as a radical and dangerous movement, has justified itself beyond the wildest dreams of its supporters.

But during all the years in which the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church existed, “Home Missions” consisted for the most part in what is now called “maintenance,” that is, the full or partial support of missionaries or ministers in what is technically known as missionary territory.

2. ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF CHURCH EXTENSION WORK

The heart of home missions.—Technically, the planting of churches in community after community is called “church extension.” It is at the heart of all home mission endeavor. In the Methodist Episcopal Church, it started in a small way in Iowa. The expansion of the West and the inability of the settlers to provide at once homes and churches without assistance came as a challenge to Iowa Methodists. Dr. Alpha Jefferson Kynett organized a local Church Extension Society at Dubuque, Iowa, in 1856. With his fellow ministers he was instrumental in collecting money and helping many a frontier preacher to erect a house of God. After travelling 2,000 miles to pitch a gospel tent, it meant something to have aid in building a church.

The society organized.—It was not until the General Conference of 1864 in Philadelphia that a church-wide organization was adopted. It was called The Church Extension Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church and was organized to help in the building of churches and parsonages. This was a great boon to struggling Methodist societies.

The loan fund.—When the Church Extension Society was organized, Methodism had 6,800 traveling preachers, 928,000 members, with 10,000 churches worth $24,000,000 and 2,900 parsonages worth $3,000,000. Within ten years, the Church Extension Society collected $3,000,000, of which $555,000 became a permanent fund to aid churches by loans. Of this sum $425,000 had been returned and relented to other churches. During this time 5,805 churches had been helped, the number of preachers had increased to 12,000 and the membership to 2,000,000.

The first loan fund was created by the Upper Iowa Conference in 1856. In 1870 this fund was transferred to the parent Society, to be used within the Conference that created it.

The General Conference of 1864 approved a constitution for the Church Extension Society which contained a provision authorizing the making of loans, but not until action had been taken by the General Conference of 1872 was the present Loan Fund with the annuity feature a part of the authorized machinery of the church. From 1864 until 1907 the Church Extension Society, which became the Board of Church Extension in 1873, conducted its great work as one of the general Boards of the Church.

3. DIVISION OF THE MISSIONARY SOCIETY

The General Conference of 1900 raised a commission on the subject of the consolidation of the benevolent societies of the church and instructed the commission as follows:

“Which commission should consider the question of the benevolent societies of the church, and should make a plan for consolidation, if it be found practicable, and publish such plan in the church papers at least one year before the meeting of the next General Conference, and report to the next General Conference.”¹

The report of this commission was made the basis of a plan for consolidation, which action created the present Board of Home Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The directions given for the consolidation are as follows:

“To the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension shall be committed all the mission work of the church in the United States and such other mission work, in countries under the jurisdiction of the United States, as may be assigned to it by the General Conference, and all the work of the present Board of Church Extension.”

“The Board of Church Extension of the Methodist Episcopal Church is hereby directed to secure an amended act of incorporation from the State of Pennsylvania under the corporate name of ‘The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Episcopal Church,’ but preserving the identity of the existing corporation; and the said Board of Home Missions and Church Extension shall discharge all obligations connected with the annuities, bequests and other property which it now holds or which it may hereafter receive from the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, or from other sources, so that the purpose of every donor shall be sacredly regarded and every trust faithfully performed. The office of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension shall be in the city of Philadelphia.”

II. FUNCTIONS OF THE BOARD OF HOME MISSIONS AND CHURCH EXTENSION

1. THE FORM OF ORGANIZATION

The technical commission.—The task of the new Board of Home Missions and Church Extension was set for it by the form of organization adopted by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1916.¹

"Its purpose shall be to prosecute missionary work in accordance with the terms of its charter, in the United States, and its possessions, not including the Philippine Islands."

The five departments.—"The more effectually to accomplish the purposes of the Board there shall be organized five departments of work, viz.: the Department of Church Extension, the Department of City Work, the Department of Rural Work, the Department of Frontier Work, and the Department of Evangelism."

Detailed information.—The detailed plans of the several departments; the relation of the board to episcopal supervision on the field; the co-operative relationships of the board with other agencies; the regulations governing appropriations and objects and projects toward which home mission and church extension aid may be given—these are clearly stated in the Discipline of 1916, paragraphs 431 to 446. These paragraphs should be reread and studied by everyone who would understand the policies and programs of this board.

2. THE TASK IN CONCRETE TERMS

A larger program.—The re-organization of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension in 1916 enlarged very much its powers and responsibilities. Up to that time the board had been largely a collecting and disbursing agency. Now it is charged with the responsibility not only of surveying city and country communities, but also of developing programs suited to such fields, discovering and helping to give specialized training to a leadership for city centers, foreign-language groups and rural communities.

Major results.—The better income of the Centenary has made it possible for the re-organized board to discharge its new responsibilities in a more adequate fashion.

It is interesting to note some of the results growing out of our larger maintenance program, making it possible to improve greatly our leadership situation in a variety of ways.

Full time workers.—The number of absentee ministers has been materially reduced, noticeably in Negro Conferences. In such fields as Porto Rico, the Mexican border, industrial, immigrant and Indian communities, we have through the years depended upon part time workers. Since we have been in position to pay better salaries, the church has been able to command the services of more competent men for full time service.

Up to Centenary days so meager was the amount of money available for use here that our pastors in our Spanish-American work in the southwest had to spend most of their week working as section hands on the railroad, laboring in the beet fields, clerking in stores, or selling real estate and life insurance. Those days are gone, let us hope, forever.

The Centenary has made it possible for the first time to secure for our faithful ministers and missionaries in Porto Rico a living support. These men with new courage are now giving full time service in that field which so greatly needs the continuous ministrations of the pastor in the extending of the kingdom of God.

Increased self-support.—It is the policy of the board so to administer maintenance funds as to bring charges now on the missionary list to self-support at the earliest possible date. A policy followed in former years in very many cases was to make small supplementary maintenance appropriations. These in most cases had little influence in the development of charges to which such appropriations were made. We have had many cases to which appropriations were made amounting to from fifty to one hundred and fifty dollars over a period of thirty to forty years and which were then no stronger than at the beginning of the period. It is the conviction of the board that slightly increased appropriations make it possible to secure stronger leadership and bring charges to self-support in from three to five years. As the result of our emphasis on such a policy, in much of the regular work of the church an improvement is seen in the large number of charges hitherto on the missionary list now coming to self-support. For example, a district superintendent in one of the newer sections of the country has been able to bring two-thirds of his missionary charges to self-support.

Comity and co-operation.—There is a growing appreciation of the importance of closer co-operation with Protestant bodies working in American fields. This spirit of co-operation is having its effect in the administration of our work in many communities. In Porto Rico, the various Protestant bodies have reached an agreement which has resulted in a division of that field so that we are working in 130 centers in Porto Rico and have no competitors in any of them. In Santo Domingo, a number of Protestant denominations are co-operating in the new development and promotion of a unified program. In the North Montana Conference with only one or two exceptions, our maintenance appropriations are made to communities in which the Methodist Episcopal Church has the sole responsibility.

Better buildings.—The Centenary income has made it possible for the board to respond more generously to the appalling needs confronting it in the matter of better buildings and equipment.

The work of the board is quite often referred to on the platform and in the public press as a new program. The truth of the matter is, that it is not so much a new program, as it is an enlargement of the old. This is especially true of church extension. In former years the board made small appropriations to initial enterprises which were usually inexpensive and temporary. At the present time the need has been to encourage the construction of buildings better suited to meet the larger needs of neighborhoods and at the same time secure equipment somewhat permanent in character.

More extensive home missions.—In the period prior to the Centenary, the board has had a very limited program of missionary work due to the fact that its income was limited. To maintain work in purely missionary fields such as mining camps, foreign-language groups, decadent downtown city sections, and similar types, the support must be provided by the general church. With the better income of the Centenary, the board has been able to begin the development of such fields in rather an extensive way.

The opportunity fund.—The work of the board in all of its history has been very largely "opportunity" in character. From the very beginning it has been our major policy to make appropriations not to cover the entire support of missionaries and the development of property, but simply to stimulate and supplement them. All of our work, for example, on the frontier and in our Negro Conferences, was developed on such a basis.

It was never possible, prior to the Centenary period, due to our limited income, for the board to make sufficiently large gifts to cities to encourage the development of necessary property in such centers.

At the last general committee meeting of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, in 1915, the committee realizing the seriousness of our situation in the cities of America due to our inability as a board to make adequate gifts, created what is known as the Special Opportunity Fund. It was hoped that from time to time some significant gifts might be made out of such a fund to encourage the development of at least a few adequate plants in our cities. It is a lamentable fact that prior to the making of those few gifts, which were made out of the Special Opportunity Fund, no significant gift had been made by the board in its history to any of our institutions in the cities of America.

III. A NEW STUDY OF THE HOME FIELD

Method of the study.—The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has acted as the central co-ordinating agency in making this study.

A set of principles and questionnaires were formulated as a basis for standardizing the study. These principles and questionnaires, together with a statement of method for making this study, were presented for review and adoption to the sub-committee on survey of the Committee of Twenty-five and to the Committee of the Board of Bishops designated for that purpose.

These principles together with uniform questionnaires were sent to each resident bishop for distribution, through his district superintendents, to be used as a basis for making a study of the needs of the districts on his area.

A preliminary study thoroughly democratic in form was then made for each district by local leadership.

On districts, where both rural and city communities are represented, separate studies were made under the auspices of the organized city and rural societies. Where a city society or a rural society was not already organized, the district superintendent was asked to appoint a committee representative of the various interests of the respective rural or city sections to co-operate with him in making the district study.

An intensive study blank was then furnished for every project whose missionary needs were under consideration by the local survey committee. This blank properly filled out by the pastor formed the basis of recommendation for inclusion in the preview.

When this local preliminary study was completed and the societies or committees were ready to make their report, a group was called together made up of the pastor and one representative from each charge or church. A representative of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension was present at this meeting.

This group reviewed the recommendation of needs presented by the survey committee and approved the preview of the district.

These needs were then submitted to the various annual conference Boards of Home Missions and Church Extension for discussion and adoption.

The previews were finally submitted, in every case to the conference cabinets for their approval, and in the case of the fall conferences of 1922 where the cabinet so recommended, they were presented to the session of the annual conference.

What is home missions?—For the purpose of standardizing the program of the church, a home field study was so made as to define clearly the various types of home missionary endeavor. The two general principles were used as a basis for this study:

1. Purely missionary projects where permanent aid may be necessary because local support for leadership and equipment is either undeveloped or uncertain and cannot be counted on to guarantee an adequate program for an indefinite period of years.

2. Opportunity missionary projects where aid in securing property and leadership is needed as a stimulus to self-support.

IV. HOME MISSIONS AND CHURCH EXTENSION NEEDS

1. THE TERRITORIES

The peculiar needs of Porto Rico, Santo Domingo, Hawaii, and Alaska are related in Part One, where the various fields are described, because each is a distinct geographical unit. These territories are all home mission fields and the work in them is under the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension.

2. THE NORTH AMERICAN INDIAN

Fifty centers of work.—John Wesley began work among the North American Indians on the Atlantic coast in 1736. In 1834, Jason Lee established his missions for Indians in the Oregon country on the Pacific coast. Today the missionary activities of the Methodist Episcopal Church among American Indians extend from coast to coast. They include nearly fifty centers of work and involve a ministry to thirty-two different tribes, including Mohawks, Onondagas and Senecas in New York; the Chippewas of Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota; the Blackfeet of Montana; the Yakimas, Klamaths, Paiutes and Modocs in the far northwest; the Yumas and Cocopahs in the southwest; the Navajos in New Mexico; and the Cherokees of North Carolina.

We are maintaining two schools and forty-one missions and help to support seventy workers, fifteen of whom are Indians.

The present program of work involves the support of preachers, teachers, religious work directors, field missionaries and nurses, and the provision of scholarships for young Indian men and women to pursue advanced courses of study in preparation for missionary labors among their own people. The need for more and better trained preachers among American Indians is urgent.

The need for schools.—Less than one-third of the Indians read and write the English language. In spite of all that the churches and the government have done, there are still 27,025 Indian children for whom no schools are provided.¹ The opportunity of the mission school is to provide the usual school courses in addition to training the young men in farming, dairying, and building; the young women in cooking, sewing, laundrying, general housekeeping, and home making; and to do this all in an environment which is thoroughly Christian, in which definite instruction and training in the religious life are prominent and important factors.

Work at government schools.—We are sharing with other denominations in the support of religious work directors at five government boarding schools and are solely responsible for this work among Protestant students in three other centers. There is need for the extension of this service. It is of very great importance that the Indian shall not become a mere educated pagan. The church, therefore, must bring to the government schools the religious training which the government itself, under our Constitution, is not permitted to provide.

Health needs.—Fifteen per cent of the Indians suffer from tuberculosis and twenty per cent from trachoma. In most American Indian homes there is little knowledge of needful measures to avoid the spread of infectious and contagious diseases. Three out of five of North American Indian babies die before they are five years of age. Many of them might be saved by a little intelligent care. The value of field missionaries and nurses in carrying the gospel of good health and better home conditions is beyond measure. From many reservations come urgent appeals for such workers, and these appeals can not longer be denied.

The field matron.—Our field matron on the Navajo reservation visited an Indian home where she found a sick baby suffering from intestinal trouble. "What have you been feeding this baby?" asked the matron. The mother replied, "Watermelon and corn." It is because of such ignorance in the care of sick children that many of them are sacrificed. Instruction is needed to provide proper sanitation and ventilation and to guard against the spread of infectious and contagious diseases. The field missionary is able to get into the Indian home and to the mother who has charge of the training of the children. We have been largely confining our missionary work to adult Indians after their habits of life have been formed. The work of the field matron makes possible an approach to the children.

Training Indian leaders.—A common fault of American Indian education is that it does not go far enough. Race leaders can rarely be developed from individuals who have covered only the elementary school grades. Our program proposes to offer aid to ambitious, but needy young people, as an incentive to higher courses of training. This is essential, if we are to develop the leaders needed.

There is woeful lack of adequate equipment and funds sufficient to support needed types of leadership. Not one of our missions has facilities for a social or recreational program.

On the world trail.—Ten thousand American Indian lads served in the recent war in one branch or another of Uncle Sam's army and navy. These boys have returned with minds that are no longer tribal. They have come to think in terms of the whole world. Many of them are asking opportunities for training that they may become leaders and teachers among their own people in order to give them the new outlook. Some are asking for training in our theological schools. Scholarships should be provided that these ambitious boys may realize their desires. Young women are also making requests for help. The appeals during the past year have been five times the number of scholarships now available.

The appeal of 10,000.—There are 50,000 Indians in the United States among whom no missionary work whatever has been done, either by the Roman Catholic or Protestant church. If the Methodist Episcopal Church assumes responsibility for those allocated to us by the Home Mission Council, we should begin new work that would provide for 10,000 of this number. Not only has our church been requested by the Home Mission Council to assume this responsibility, but the Indians themselves are asking that we come. As one pagan Chippewa chief said, "The

An Indian church that has been allowed to fall into disrepair

Methodists have what we want; send the Methodists."

3. MORMON TERRITORY

Mormon strength.—The Mormons are a religious sect whose principles are in contradiction to the teachings of Protestantism. They seek to conserve and to propagate their faith through the use of their organization in business and in politics. Utah is the state in which they are particularly dominant. Yet southern Idaho is almost as much Mormon as Utah and groups of the sect are found in many other sections of the West, especially Wyoming, Arizona and Nevada. Their societies have been organized and churches built in some eastern centers of the United States. They number more than 500,000 adherents.

The Christian leaven.—It is true that just now there seem to be signs that the right to individual thinking is asserting itself among the Mormons. Christian ideals and ideas are slowly bearing fruit in spite of all the hindrances. Contact with other minds in business and in schools is breaking down irrational superstitions. Our program has not been one of proselytism, but rather one of constructive religious teaching, which in time undermines false teachings and commands the approval of hearts made for truth.

The Mormon territory—the field

Chief Two Guns White Calf, whose face you've often seen—on nickels

Some Mormons have been received into our church and more will follow. In fact, the situation just now indicates that a day of rapid advance is not far ahead. Many are already beginning to break with the old superstition. A strong established church proclaiming life and liberty, will be necessary if large numbers are not to lapse into skepticism and unbelief. A vital church program has tended also to affect the message of the Mormon leaders. Reference is often made by them in addresses to Jesus and his moral ideals. The church has lifted up the Christ until he is securing some recognition. The result will be that the hearts and minds that open their doors to him even slightly will come to feel more and more of his transforming influence. This is the day for providing adequate and attractive buildings and the launching of a thoroughly comprehensive program of religious service in these Mormon fields.

With the development of irrigation and extension of the mining and allied industries in these supposedly desert states, they will become more and more significant in the life of the nation.

4. THE NEGRO

1. A General Statement

When one pauses to think of that group of Americans who are Negroes he enters a world consisting of nearly ten million souls who have wrapt up in them all the needs and longings, powers, and possibilities of human nature. All too slowly have the principles and ideals of American democracy been applied to these peoples.

While some Negroes have made commendable progress, the masses have yet to be lifted. Illiteracy, poverty, race prejudice, industrial restrictions, unspeakable living conditions, the northern exodus and inadequate leadership are present factors in the life of this people with which the church must deal in the most consecrated way.

The northward trend of the Negro population continues and these people, used to farming and outdoor life, are now to be found in industrial centers where housing conditions are often unspeakable and where young people are a prey to the worst elements of the community.

A decade ago the task of uplifting the Negro lay predominately in our southland. Today the challenge comes almost as formidably out of the northern centers.

The Methodist Episcopal Church must listen to their voices, sometimes resonant with hope, sometimes weary with disappointment, as they seek better treatment, a fair chance for education, reasonable economic conditions in city and country and an even-handed justice everywhere.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has 327,467 Negro members in the United States. And because the Negro members of our church have had better opportunities, we have the unique advantage of shaping, in a large way, the destiny of this plastic race.

2. The City Negro in the North

The northern migration.—The largest population of Negroes in single groups or colonies is no longer found in the South,

At a northern church service but in the northern cities. The migration to the North has not ceased.

During the last ten years the Negro population in Chicago has increased 150 per cent and in Cleveland 300 per cent. In smaller industrial centers, for example, Youngstown, Ohio, the increase has reached 244 per cent. The migration to the northern cities ranges from Boston and Philadelphia to Kansas City and Duluth, and from Denver to San Francisco. Housing facilities are very crowded. "Boundaries" of Negro colonies are expanding. Schools and churches are urgently needed as well as provision for sound recreation and social life. The Negro is essentially religious. In various groups they have rented stores and dwelling houses and often have occupied cellars, for church services. Every sort of non-descript religious group has taken advantage of the situation.

3. The City Negroes in the South

Population increasing.—Notwithstanding the movement to the North, the popu-

This was used as a church by a group of northern Negroes for a long time, but now they have a new church home. Look down in the right-hand corner of this page lation of Negroes in southern cities is constantly increasing. In some cities the recent increase has been as high as thirty-four per cent. While many southern Negroes have made noteworthy progress and live in good homes, the vast majority in the larger cities live in congested quarters with unimproved streets, inadequate school and church facilities and where general conditions severely handicap moral and religious progress.

While our denomination has made some progress in educational work among the Negroes, not until the beginning of the Centenary did we have a dozen well-built Negro church buildings in all the southland.

Our form of organization and supervision and our attitude toward universal fraternity in the church places us in a position of leadership and responsibility among Negroes in the cities of the South. Our national safety as well as the moral development of the race demands that we heed the calls that timidly arise from crowded Negro quarters in southern cities.

4. The Rural Agricultural Negro

A southern problem.—By the rural agricultural Negro, we mean all Negroes engaged in agricultural pursuits, and also those who reside in town and village communities whose existence is primarily dependent on agriculture.

Notwithstanding the large influx of Negroes in the North, eighty-five per cent of the race live in the South, and a vast majority of them are in agricultural communities.

Tenantry and ownership.—Two-thirds of the Negroes of the rural South, however, are tenant farmers and America has no tenantry problem larger and more complex than this. In Georgia, 4,498,836 acres of farm land are worked by Negro tenants; in Alabama, 3,489,142 acres; in Mississippi, 3,986,830; a total including all the Southern States of 23,633,113 acres.

Their new church

There have been few improvements in farming methods, due very largely to the cheapness of labor, the large number of tenants and their low state of development. Major Millsaps of Jackson, Mississippi, founder of Millsaps College, said, "It has been popular here, now happily growing less so, to exploit the Negro by high store prices (the store is usually on the plantation), encouraging him to get in debt. It has often made him hopeless."¹ Fully three millions of Negroes live under these conditions.

Negroes in the rural South own about one-third of the farms they work. The communities which show the greatest advancement in this respect are those where the missionary agencies of the North have done their best work. Ownership has not carried with it independence and wealth, but it has resulted in better home life, better morals, higher religious ideals, self-support and generous contributions to the general program of the church.

The religious and missionary problems involved in these communities are more or less unique, yet, upon analysis, they resolve themselves into questions of buildings and leadership.

The characteristic rural church for Negroes is a small, rough, one-room building, constructed of crude materials and wholly unsuited to any sort of activity, except the holding of platform meetings. The majority of the buildings are either heirlooms handed down from the days of slavery or weather-boarded buildings fashioned after them. One might travel over the entire Baton Rouge District of the Louisiana Conference or the Huntsville District of the Central Alabama Conference, the Western District of the North Carolina Conference, the Savannah District of the Savannah Conference or any district in the Tennessee Conference and find scarcely a Negro church that is not a plain weather-boarded building, furnished with ordinary "two-strips-across-the-back" benches. The exception to this will almost invariably be those country churches which the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has assisted in recent years.

Perhaps the most outstanding need of the rural Negro churches is the providing of adequate buildings. Particularly should there be an adequate centralized church plant on each circuit to serve as a community center.

"Rosenwald Schools."—A few years ago the rural public school buildings for Negroes in the South were in a disreputable condition. Among others, Julius Rosenwald, a Jewish philanthropist of Chicago, became greatly interested in correcting this condition. He evolved a plan and provided the resources for assisting such communities as stood ready to help themselves, in the construction of new and adequate school buildings. Today more than a thousand communities scattered all over the Southern States are sharing in the benefits of "Rosenwald Schools." As a by-product of this movement, it has been possible to secure better teachers for these better schools and many communities have been stimulated to erect adequate school buildings for themselves. This single movement made by one man has done for the rural Negro schools of the South a service, the value of which is past computation. The time is ripe for our church to do for the rural Negro church of the South what has been so well begun for the rural school.

The need of trained leaders.—Closely associated with the question of buildings is that of leadership. The evil of the absentee pastor, with church services held once a month or once in two weeks and then by an untrained farmer-preacher, must in some way be overcome. Already definite steps have been taken to provide trained leaders through the establishment of a professorship for rural training at Gammon Theological Seminary, Atlanta, Georgia, and through the holding of summer schools for rural pastors already in service. The Negro pastor in a rural church is confronted with such conditions of disease, lack of sanitation, inadequate nourishment, poverty and lack of adequate social and educational opportunities that he must be equipped to lead his people to better things in all of these fields. The Home Mission policy and program of the Methodist Episcopal Church is to minister to all of these varied needs and thus bring a richer and fuller life to our millions of Negro Americans.

5. The Rural Industrial Negro

In both South and North.—The rural industrial Negro settlements, which are scattered all through the South and some sections of the North, include the cotton mill towns, the oyster and fishing settlements of Maryland and Virginia, the mining towns of Alabama, West Virginia and Kentucky and the turpentine, lumber and construction camps in several states. These settlements present problems peculiar to themselves. The population is largely transient, thus placing upon the local church a responsibility too heavy to be carried without assistance.

These centers constitute an important missionary responsibility which the church must no longer neglect.

5. INDUSTRIAL WORKERS

1. Industrial Villages and Towns

Church work difficult.—Industrial workers in villages and towns include groups of laboring people mainly dependent for living upon industrial activities rather than upon agriculture. They are found principally in the mining camps, lumber and logging camps, quarries, cement factories, coke and chemical works, fishing communities, cotton mill and other textile and small mill towns.

There is usually extreme centralization of wealth in the hands of operators, many of whom are absentee and by religious or racial affiliation are not interested in the work of Protestant churches. A steady income for the worker is very uncertain and transiency runs as high as seventy-five per cent in a year. Uncertainty and real poverty make maintenance of adequate church work most difficult. There is also a large percentage of foreign-speaking population in these industrial communities.

Mining camps.—The latest available statistics on occupations that may be properly classed as rural industrial show that there are over 1,000,000 employed in mining alone. This, at a conservative estimate, represents a total population of at least 3,000,000.

The lumber industry.—Lumber and logging camps represent a missionary task demanding a high grade, especially adapted missionary service. The map shown below indicates the logging activities of concerns having a capital of $75,000 or over. We are working in but one place. The future program demands that the great responsible religious organization, the Methodist Episcopal Church, plan to do the work adequately. The places where we are not at work are practically neglected by religious agencies. Not only are the loggers to be considered, but also their families. In many of these places, there are conditions which make our advance imperative for the sake of the children.

2. Industrial Cities

A clear mission field.—The Methodist Episcopal Church has an important obligation in scores of communities in cities whose population is made up of skilled and unskilled workers in the industries.

These industrial communities, with their congested housing conditions and shifting populations, usually tenants, many of whom are foreign, have very inadequate religious, education and worship facilities. Here uncertainty, overcrowding, ignorance, misunderstanding, poverty and exploitation create unrest, strife and depression.

The absence of the owners and managers from the community leaves such groups peculiarly unable to provide, without outside aid, the leadership and equipment needed for their evangelization and Christian development.

Some notable beginnings.—When an investment is made which is sufficient for instituting a seven-day-a-week program serving the needs of these people, they rally eagerly to its support.

6. THE CITIES

1. General Statement

One hundred and forty-four cities each have 50,000 or more population.

Forty-two per cent or 44,000,000 of our total population are in cities of more than 10,000.

In 1920, 21,760,000 of foreign birth and the children of foreign-born parents were found in cities of 25,000 and over. The cities are growing more rapidly than the church is adjusting itself to the conditions created by the un-dreamed-of development.

Twenty-three cities with more than 25,000 people have increased from 105 per cent to 1,266 per cent since 1910.

The cities are a maelstrom of conditions involved in industrial situations, over-crowded housing, enforced mingling of various nationalities and races and the rapid shifting and growth of population.

The city work of the church, especially from the missionary point of view, seems to fall into five general divisions:

a. Downtown churches, often with a substantial church constituency drawn from distant points, but neglecting the polyglot, transient masses nearby.

b. Semi-downtown neighborhood parishes, where the constituency has moved away leaving the church helpless in reaching the immediate broken community.

c. The older changing residential communities, whose population is disintegrating, bringing in new unchurched elements demanding an adapted program.

d. Newly developing residential sections, usually homogeneous in population but where the constituency is unorganized and undeveloped.

e. Suburban developments.

2. Downtown Churches

City sore spots.—In nearly every one of the 287 cities of 25,000 and over in the United States, there is at least one "downtown situation." The supporting membership has been driven out by changing conditions to the newer residential sections leaving the downtown church surrounded with great unchurched populations, largely foreign and crowded into the back streets and alleys.

In this section of the city are the business blocks, factories, theaters, hotels and poor grade of apartments. It is the congested, corrupted and sin-ridden sections of the city's life that usually become malignant sores upon the body politic. The necessity of vitalizing and maintaining the downtown church is inseparable from the task of city evangelism. The children and young people in these sections must be reached, Americanized and Christianized for the sake of the future. Here in the humble homes or in the boarding houses dwell many of the cities' future leaders in business, professional and political life.

The church center.—The downtown church as a center must vitally relate itself to the welfare of the entire city.

A city church in the theater district flings out the banner town centers of all our larger cities, there are churches in the downtown or semi-downtown sections whose membership is a mere remnant of the former supporting membership. The usual condition of these churches is the necessity of closing their doors just as the need for their existence becomes increasingly acute. The community is usually congested with low living ideals and lack of proper home conditions for children and young people.

The field requires specially trained leadership who can plan and carry for-

Its ministry must break down prejudices and provide a meeting ground for all classes. It must lead in reform and in humanitarian work. The crowds must be reached with the universal language of a service ministry. The downtown is usually purely missionary in character and exceedingly urgent. Outside aid must be provided to remodel or improve the property. A trained leader and a staff who understand the complexities of the modern city must be provided.

Outstanding downtown service.—One of the greatest achievements of the Centenary under the reorganized Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has been the changed front in many so-called hopeless downtown churches.

3. Semi-downtown Neighborhood Parishes

Many "Old First" churches need their properties entirely overhauled or made more nearly fit for a seven-day-a-week ministry. In some cases additional real estate must be purchased and parish houses must be erected.

This church had to give up its traditional program in order to furnish a seven-day-a-week ministry to the foreign-speaking and unskilled laboring community that moved into its vicinity changing residential community."

ward a strong and vital program which will include social, recreational and religious educational work and usually a thorough-going program for Americanization.

4. Older Changing Residential Communities

The challenge of the transient.—In the older residential sections of the city, the better classes of people, economically and morally, are constantly moving out and unskilled labor with a large sprinkling of foreign-speaking people are taking their places. Old homes are remodeled into apartments and flats. While the older church constituency is decreasing, the population of the community to be served is larger than ever. In this type of community, the newcomers who are moving in are not interested in the church and in many cases are entirely antagonistic. The church must be reinforced through some outside agency or cease to exist. Usually the building must be remodeled so as to lend itself to a thorough-going community program, including recreation and religious education, as well as worship. Especially trained leadership is necessary. Experience teaches that where a church of this kind is willing to adjust itself to the changing conditions of its community, the people of the neighborhood are quick to respond. Churches which would have been abandoned under the traditional program, have become busy centers carrying forward a seven-day-a-week ministry.

5. Developing Residential Communities

A missionary investment.—Just beyond the older residential sections of our cities is a zone adjoining the newer residential streets, spreading out from the older sections, but still within the city limits. This section of a city usually remains static for a number of years and then begins to grow very rapidly. We usually find a one-room church, often poorly located, that has been utterly ineffective in comparison with the great development of the community.

During the Centenary, in many cases of this kind, a comparatively small investment of missionary funds has enabled the local church to secure a strategic location, build a new and more adequate and more attractive plant, and within a year or two such churches have reached a place of permanence and power in the life of the community. Unless such stimulus from the outside is rendered and capable leadership established, churches of this type are doomed to defeat in these communities of good homes, schools, parks and clubs.

6. Suburban Developments

The suburban problem.—Practically every American city of 75,000 population or over is spreading out into suburban communities. The development of rapid transit lines, the desire to establish a home in a more pleasant environment and the crowding of the city with consequent ascending real estate values are responsible for suburban development.

The people settling in the suburbs are for the most part salaried people and young business or professional men with fair salaries or "just getting started." They buy their homes by making monthly payments. Some suburban communities, on account of their location, are almost entirely inhabited by employees of industries.

Typical growing suburban community

Up until the time of the Centenary, in such communities the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension of the Methodist Episcopal Church was not in position to co-operate. The local congregations, with very little strength, undertook to carry the burden alone and in a majority of instances failed to accomplish an adequate piece of church work. Some preposterous and irretrievable mistakes have been made in these cases.

A typical case.—A rapidly growing suburb is open to the denomination which is able to care for it properly. Our Methodist leaders look over the situation, discover the cheapest and hence the poorest location, or perhaps someone offers to donate a location that is usually not adapted to the work, yet the best that can be secured because of the straitened financial condition. They build a $4,000 to $6,000 chapel, secure a minister for $800 to $1,200 a year, and launch their program in the midst of this fine populous community. They have a difficult time because of the unsuitable equipment and the inadequate leadership and are barely able to exist. In three or four years, another denomination sends its leaders to look over the field, they determine it is inadequately churchled and probably launch a program, which because of their financial condition, is of the same inadequate character as that inaugurated by the Methodists. Then come the churches of other denominations, one after the other, and do likewise. Thus is laid the foundation for a generation or more. The spirit of competition, rivalry and in some instances open strife, divide the people into groups. Each group seeks to build up its own enterprises at the expense of all the others. Work worthy of the kingdom of God cannot be accomplished. The churches through this policy are inevitably brought into ill repute and finally into confusion and defeat.

The new policy.—The present policy of the board is, when possible, to make a scientific inventory of such a community, assist the people in purchasing the most strategic location and then aid them through a modest donation as a challenge to erect a $25,000 to $75,000 plant more nearly adequate to carry a program which includes all necessary social, educational, recreational and spiritual ministry. A first class pastor is secured, one competent in leadership to grip the heart of the community and make a vital religious contribution. The people respond and ultimately a great church, dominating the whole community, is developed.

With our church thus adequately equipped and having a competent leadership, the other denominations making an investigation of the field are satisfied that the community is well cared for and turn their attention elsewhere. This congregation not only immediately pays back to the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension the original donation, but also becomes for all time a great source of revenue to all the benevolent enterprises of the denomination. This method has proven itself to be an unqualified success and an exhibition of wise statesmanship. The interests of the kingdom keep pace with the growth of the community where the church is thus well established.

7. THE FOREIGN-LANGUAGE GROUPS

1. The Orientals

An international opportunity.—According to the 1920 census, there are in the United States 111,010 Japanese, 61,639 Chinese, 5,603 Filipinos, 2,507 Hindus, and 1,224 Koreans. Their sojourn in our country gives America a rare opportunity to mold life and character and to start influences which will eventually affect the lands from which these people have come to America.

Race prejudice.—All of the reasons which lead us to send missionaries to Japan and China may also be urged for the evangelization of the Orientals in the

Above—the public school in a certain town

United States. Added to these considerations, however, is the fact that in many American communities, these Orientals are the victims of sharp racial discrimination. It then becomes doubly important that someone shall approach them in the spirit of Jesus Christ. A string of effective churches with well trained pastors along the Pacific Coast stands as a witness to the fact that they do and will respond to such an approach. The record for self-support and for missionary giving on the part of these Japanese and Chinese churches has been a most commendable one.

The sincerity of our Christianity is being tested by these people of an alien race who are among us. Whatever our attitude upon questions of immigration may be, we can find no Christian excuse for treating these friends from the Orient in anything but a Christian manner. They are here, and there is no possibility of eliminating them even if we would. The number of Chinese is steadily decreasing and the number of Japanese is increasing only by the birth of children who are American citizens and who will grow up in our public schools. Surely we cannot fail to share with these people the very best which we have, the Christian religion.

Distribution of Methodist work.—The Methodist Episcopal Church is reaching a group of Koreans in New York City. There is a Japanese Church in New York, and important Chinese work in New York, Philadelphia and Boston. Our largest Oriental work, however, is west of the Mississippi River. It extends into a number of western states, but is best developed along the Pacific coast and particularly in California where the largest number of Orientals reside. San Francisco, Los Angeles, Sacramento, and Mexicali in Lower California are the four chief centers of Oriental population.

While the Chinese are not so numerous as the Japanese, nevertheless, there is a field for a large piece of missionary work among them. The total number of Chinese in California was 28,612 in 1920.

The student group.—Among the Orientals we are touching several quite distinct groups. There are the Oriental students who flock to our great educational centers and who have sometimes returned to their own countries less religious than when they came.

Other Oriental contacts. — There is also another group made up of individuals in business, industrial or agricultural pursuits who are in this country more or less temporarily, although the periods of residence often extend over many years. Another group is made up of native born Orientals and therefore American citizens or of persons who have become eligible for citizenship through service in the World War. Perhaps no better single illustration of the effectiveness of our work could be cited than the following letter written by an enlisted Japanese boy, who had been in our Berkeley, California, church, to a friend who was about to enlist, the latter, a member of our Sunday school in Oakland:

"I know you will live straight and be a true and loyal soldier of democracy. Don't for a moment think that the army is full of immoral or degraded fellows. No, not by a long shot. They are few, or rather in the minority. But my advice to you is to keep your book of life a clean sheet. Use pure English and avoid and abstain from language unbecoming a true American. It is the only way, by your actions and daily life, that you can prove to the American people the true worth of Japanese blood in an American community. You are one of the few chosen ones, and upon you and me rests a great responsibility. You are the link of friendship and the bond which will tie the East and West. All I can ask of you is to do your level best and be worthy of the people who bid you godspeed and await the news of your progress. And last, the most important of all, be true, be loyal, be faithful to the land of lands, my own United States!"

2. Mexicans and Spanish-Speaking Americans

Two distinct problems.—What is often loosely spoken of as the Mexican problem in our Southwest presents in reality two quite distinct situations.

By the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, made with Mexico in 1848, the United States took over important areas of our present Southwest. With the acquisition of this territory we also acquired an important group of Spanish-speaking citizens. Living on the frontier, these new citizens were not quickly assimilated and they did not learn the English language. The years passed, new generations were born, and today the descendants of these early Spanish-speaking peoples are still speaking the Spanish language in New Mexico and they form approximately sixty per cent of the population of that state. Even the work of the courts and the state legislature must be carried on in Spanish or translated into that language so that the individuals concerned may understand what is being done. It is hardly fair to call these people, who have for several generations been an integral part of the United States, "Mexicans." They are Americans who still speak the Spanish language.

Mexican immigrants.—On the other hand, we do have a very large number of real Mexicans who have arrived more or less recently in the United States. The overthrow of the Diaz government in Mexico with the ensuing revolutions made conditions so intolerable in Mexico that multitudes of Mexicans entered this country as refugees. Some came through the regular channels of immigration, some came by special permit as contract laborers and many more merely "stepped across the border." These people are scattered all over the United States from New York to the Pacific Coast, but an overwhelming majority of them are to be found in the states of Texas, Colorado, Arizona, and California. Relatively few of them have settled in New Mexico. They are to be found not only in congested city centers such as San Antonio, El Paso, Los Angeles and lesser cities, but in thousands of small hamlets and in rural and industrial communities of every sort and description.

Indispensable to industry.—Whatever may have been the original intention of these immigrants, it is now apparent that they are to become a permanent part of our national life. There is, of course, some shifting back and forth across the border, but the tendency is for the returning immigrant to bring several others to the United States with him. The Mexican has already made himself well-nigh indispensable to the mines and railroads, to the sugar beet industry in Colorado, to the onion growers of Texas, to the cotton planters of Arizona, and to the producers of vegetables, walnuts and citrus fruits. There is hardly any sort of manual labor in the great Southwest, in which the Mexican does not find a place. He has become an economic factor.

Important advances. — The Methodist Episcopal Church has registered important advances in recent years in its work among Mexicans and Spanish-speaking people in the United States. This is particularly true of the work in New Mexico, Arizona, and California where new workers have been raised up and trained, new church buildings erected and many remarkable conversions have taken place.

Through the Mexican immigrants now in the United States, we have an unprecedented opportunity to interpret America and the Christian religion to our near neighbor, Mexico, and to promote mutual understanding and to improve the relationships between Mexico and the United States. Mexico is not only at our doors, but a substantial number of her people are within our own borders. In this situation, we find an opportunity, a responsibility and a test of our loyalty to the Master who said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

3. The Older Immigration

National unity. — Developing a strong and sturdy nation does not necessarily pre-suppose people of one blood, but rather people of one mind. Out of the diversity of races there must be created the unity of spirit, a task in which the church, through its missionary agencies, renders the state a most unique and unifying service. Especially has this been the case among the older immigrants.

A contribution to American life. — In the older immigration, there are the Danes, Germans, Norwegians, Swedes, and Swiss. These racial groups arrived as early as the seventeenth century and their descendants today number about twenty-three million. They have made a most important and nationally valuable contribution in the laying of the foundations and the building up of our nation, and in conserving its unity. They have settled for the most part in the Central and Northwestern states, though large numbers are in Texas, in the Pacific Northwest, and in practically every large city of the union.

In the crowded industrial centers, in the silk and woolen mills of the East, and in the jewelry, furniture, steel, automobile, leather and glass industries and at the shipping ports, they predominate. They are also largely the tillers of the soil in the mountain regions of many states, where they are mostly unchurched. In Texas and in some Northern borderline states whole counties are practically populated with Germans, Swedes, and Danes, many coming from Canada where there are growing settlements of these groups. California, Nebraska, Michigan, Ohio, and Pennsylvania have large colonies of German-speaking Russians with only a few mission churches ministering to them. In Utah, numerous Swiss centers are without a church, while in the expansive agricultural areas of the West and Northwest large sections of these people have no organized church life, but are mainly found in the Turnverein and lodge and have no connection with the church. It is estimated that from eight to ten millions of these older immigrant groups are not yet affiliated with the church.

4. The Newer Immigration

A national problem.—The presence in America, of foreigners, and their children, totaling one-third of our population, demands that we press upon their attention through every possible means, the Christian principles we believe essential for the highest human attainment.

Since 1880 the newer immigration from southern and eastern Europe has brought us an entirely different class of New Americans. Our Italians, Russians, and Poles are numbered by millions. They are crowded into our great industrial centers and spread throughout the rural districts. The principle of "safety first" demands that we press upon their hearts and minds those fundamental religious ideals and convictions that have founded our national life.

Not only their evangelization, but their Americanization requires most strenuous efforts by the churches, and no Americanization in any cheap or shallow sense is meant. They need to be rooted and grounded in the faith that made our fathers die for our institutions while their fathers were bombing the institutions they were forced to support.

A high government official said, "If it were possible to do so, America could make no investment for the public safety that would equal in results and expenditure the continuance and extension of the work with foreigners as it is being done by several churches which I could name." We must not allow this fundamental Americanization program to be displaced by a shallow program carried on by agencies that leave the gospel out.

The harvest is ripe.—
We have no longer any

Senior and Adult Departments of a Russian Sunday school question as to our responsibility for missionary work with the foreign-speaking masses in the home land, neither is there any doubt as to the results possible.

Although from countries where the Roman or Greek Catholic churches dominate, a high percentage of these people are open to the evangelical appeal. In a free country, many have broken from the domination of the Catholic church and have become agnostic, radical or professedly atheistic. But these need Christ and many of them realize their need.

Many adults of the first generation of immigrants retain a formal loyalty to their traditional faith. The second generation, however, mingling in the public school and in business with Gentiles and with Protestants, find their prejudices broken down and will not enforce upon their children a formal loyalty to the old country faith of their fathers.

The work demands extreme haste, not only on account of the vast numbers now approachable, but also because there is every indication that with the renewed activity of our industries and the consequent need of unskilled labor, every effort will be made to increase immigration.

Methodist responsibility.—As a denomination, our responsibility is even greater than is indicated by our relative membership among the evangelical denominations.

The leadership that is now available and is becoming available for this work in response to appeals for workers in the home land is encouraging. This is true of language pastors and of American workers, both trained and consecrated to this form of work. There are entering our schools an increasing number who feel the call and urge of the mission field in America. This very encouraging outlook as to leadership will admit of no slacking of the program.

We can go forward into this staggering task in humble confidence that we, as a Church, have been called to this field and can render effective service in it.

Our Italian work.—Our most extensive mission to foreign-speaking groups is that to the Italians. This work now reaches sixty-five points, scattered from Portland, Maine, to Los Angeles, and from Chicago to New Orleans. There are many stories of achievement, but there are as many unmet needs. Work in temporary buildings, rented halls and dwellings ought to be established in real church buildings. New centers should be opened immediately at scores of points where contacts have been established. The "First Italian Methodist Episcopal Church of Los Angeles" worships in a disreputable shack. Only the utmost faith could expect good results where such equipment must be used.

5. Immigrant Port Work

The time for friendly aid.—There is no time when an immigrant is so much in need of help and when assistance is so greatly appreciated as at the time of his arrival in America. It is generally admitted by those who know, that any kind of attention or act of service rendered to an immigrant while he is en route or within thirty days of arriving, looms larger in his appreciation than twice that amount of attention after he is settled. It is then, too, that he gets his first and most lasting impressions of America. To meet the immigrant at the port of entry, to give him a friendly word and assistance in meeting his immediate problems, to furnish him reading matter, to save him from the altogether too frequent exploitation on the part of unscrupulous persons and to help him locate

Foreign language periodicals read in the parish of an eastern city church with his friends and to find a job—that is a part of our task.

Co-operative plans.—The most important points are Boston, New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New Orleans, and San Francisco. This is a work in which co-operation is particularly desirable. At Ellis Island a plan of co-operation involving Jewish, Catholic, Protestant and other religious and welfare agencies is in operation. This should be extended to other ports. The Home Missions Council, The Travelers Aid of America, and The World Alliance for International Friendship have all offered to co-operate in this field. Here is an opportunity for the Methodist Episcopal Church to co-operate in establishing the greatest piece of immigrant aid work ever attempted. It involves meeting the immigrant at the port of embarkation; meeting him at our American ports, and touching him with helpful service up to the time when he gets his job and is settled with friends in America.

8. RURAL PROBLEMS

1. The Medium-sized Residential Town

The near city.—In communities from about 2,500 to about 10,000 population, we

Doctor and nurse provided by a church community center find religious conditions of a peculiar type. The medium sized residential town is to be found in every part of the country. Quite often it is the county seat town. In other cases it is the overgrown agricultural village or has become a large enough manufacturing center to call itself a city. Retired farmers, trades-people and a limited number of manufacturers may be found. Wage earners, while underpaid, are not class conscious as they are in the cities or in the transient agricultural labor sections.

Religious and social needs.—The following characteristics justify the consideration of this type of community in the home mission and church extension program of the church:

a. Most of the church buildings now in use have been erected from thirty to fifty years and while many of them are good looking they are almost totally inadequate for a modern church program.

b. In most towns of this size the conventional ideas as to what constitutes religious service prevail. About the only social centers in many such towns are pool rooms and dance halls. The older men go to lodges. The churches are respectable clubs of a limited group of families with their younger children. They do not have a vital program touching the community or even their own constituency.

c. Very few of these towns have Christian Association buildings. The demand for community service equipment is likely to be met by funds raised and controlled outside the churches. Abundance of experience exists to show the dangers of private commercialized control of amusements.

d. The immediate need in most of these places is either modern church buildings or additions for larger service, or a definite broadening of program to meet community needs.

e. As in many other types of American communities, while there is local wealth, it is not available.

f. In many cases the truly progressive church membership is not the financially able element. When once improvements are introduced, local support is assured. Aid is needed until the value of the improvement is demonstrated to the community.

g. A home mission or church extension contribution is a stimulus to right building. Conditions may be made to a gift that will result in better location, more commodious rooms and other factors that experience and study indicate to be advisable.

2. The Agricultural Village and Surrounding Country

The village center.—The majority of Methodist Episcopal churches today are located in incorporated villages and towns. With the improvement of roads the village has become increasingly the center of educational, social and religious life. The agricultural village is a national institution and its church may be considered the prevailing type of rural church.

A very large proportion of the church buildings now being used in such villages were erected in days when the place of the church in the community was radically different from what it is today. The churches have maintained small insignificant plants, usually with only one room. In a small per cent of cases, there have been an extra room for Sunday school and an unsanitary basement for occasional adult socials. Meanwhile, other agencies have often gone ahead, providing the most modern type of equipment for present day needs. The result has been that the church as a useful servant in the community has fallen in the estimation of people. In many villages the population has changed until now they are more predominantly the home of retired farmers who are conservative and whose resources for church purposes are not available in large amounts, trades people, farm laborers and their families, who usually are tenants and whose resources are very limited.

In most cases the building of a structure suitable to modern needs presents a crisis in the local community that cannot be met unless outside aid is given. Pastors' salaries are very low in a large percentage of these fields.

Village needs.—An illustrative type of askings for village agricultural communities is the following:

New Boston, in the Central Illinois Conference, a village with an agricultural environment, has a population of 1000 people. Our church has the responsibility for this field. There is little local interest in things religious. The church building is dilapidated and the salary so low that able ministers cannot be persuaded to go there unless assured of adequate support for their families. Unless aid is given both for building and pastoral support, until the place has been revitalized, it will gradually revert to practical paganism as many other neglected communities have done.

3. The Agricultural Open Country

The country circuit.—The Methodist Episcopal Church has a very large responsibility for religious work in the open country. Our circuit riders with missionary fervor and holy zeal penetrated isolated communities, crossed the plains and organized Methodist classes everywhere. The open country church is characteristic of Methodism from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In most of these sections, the primitive circuit system of Methodism persists to an excessive degree. Pastors usually live in some village or city center and go out for occasional services in the country church. The conditions that affect the farmers as a class affect the life and financial ability of the open country church.

A national bulwark.—The "churches in the wildwood" as well as on the prairie have been and are our principal recruiting stations for furnishing Christian leaders for the church and the nation. Many a little country church has sent at least a dozen of its sons into American pulpits and to the mission fields of the world.

No one questions the farmer's stand on prohibition and other moral issues. But it must be clearly understood that agricultural life today is making rapid changes and it is necessary that the open country church keep up-to-date if it is to direct religious forces in the country.

A new program needed.—Modern church buildings have been slowest to reach the farmers. Most churches in the open country are modeled after the little pioneer school house with the sole addition of a small steeple. But with Methodism's enlarging program of ministering to the whole of man as well as to every man, social rooms and equipment for religious education must be provided as well as the sanctuary for worship.

The time has now come, in fact is here, when our church must recognize the new farm consciousness and be ready to meet it with an improved church program, both as to leadership and equipment. Co-operative organizations among farmers are increasing by leaps and bounds. Automobiles, good roads, and the movies in town are factors in the changing farm life. Our task during these changes is to keep the church in its rightful place of leadership.

Limited resources.—In general, resources are limited. Studies of farm incomes, salaries paid pastors and teachers, and funds available for public improvements, indicate that the rank and file of the farmers in America today are still below the average in financial resources.¹ The result is shown in the abandoned farms, the exodus of wage earning groups to cities, low salaries for teachers and ministers, and the constant shift of pastors from rural to urban service.

Where there is wealth it is likely to be controlled by a very few who have little or no interest in local improvements.

¹ Twenty-eight per cent of the people of the United States gainfully employed are engaged in agriculture, but they receive only about eighteen per cent of the total national income. The average annual per capita income of the people engaged in agriculture during the ten years 1909-1918 was only a little over half that of the people engaged in the other major industries. These figures are taken from the United States Census of Occupations and from a survey, Income in the United States, prepared by Mitchell, King, MacCauley and Knauth, and published by the National Bureau of Economic Research.

4. Isolated and Range Populations

Two types of isolation.—There are vast stretches in the south central and western parts of the United States where large herds of cattle and flocks of sheep still graze, where dry farming is being carried on and where, in the mountainous regions, small farming is combined with hunting and trapping. The land is often badly broken and moisture is limited and uncertain. Two general types of isolation are found. The first is without any considerable town or village center, simply cross-roads trading posts serving as gathering places for the people. These centers, however, are visited only when necessity arises and very little social and certainly no religious significance can be attached to them. The second are the small villages and towns which serve centers sometimes far removed from the railroads.

The old missionary frontier.— Communities of both types often present very great missionary need. The reasons are more or less obvious.

a. The number of people is so small that even though they had the same incomes as enjoyed by others in more favored rural sections of the country, their resources would not be sufficient to support the work.

b. The very limitation of their social contacts tends to make them indifferent toward religion and particularly some of the older forms of religious expression.

Old sod farm house

c. The distances to be travelled as well as the condition of the roads interfere with lation in these now sparsely settled regions is destined to increase and we have the fine opportunity not only of ministering now to people who are in real need, but also regular attendance at religious services.

d. Owing to the lack of moisture and other natural limitations causing uncertainty of crops and income, the majority of these frontier people are continually on the verge of poverty. There are sections of Montana, for example, where seven successive crop failures have reduced people to destitution and forced owners to abandon their lands and seek employment elsewhere.

Under such conditions thousands of children are being reared without churches, without Sunday schools, without ministers of religion, and without religious training. Other thousands are enjoying these privileges only because missionary funds are made available for assisting in the support of the work. If the gospel of Jesus Christ is to be made known to the parents and children in such isolated communities, and if Christian ideals are to be maintained and built into the life of these new settlements, it will be because home mission aid makes it possible. The population in these now sparsely settled regions is destined to increase and we have the fine opportunity not only of ministering now to people who are in real need, but also

5. Tenant and Transient Agricultural People

The increase of tenancy.—In the best agricultural sections of the country, since 1870, there has been a gradually growing tenant population on the farms. According to the United States census, 1920, 1,558,000 (twenty-five per cent) of the farm operatives in the United States had been on their present farms one year or less. Over fifty per cent of them have been on their farms four years or less. The great majority of the persistent movers are “tenants.” Rents are rising and the income passes to absentee residents. The transiency of the tenant introduces into the country where land values may be high, exactly the same condition that exists in the industrial populations in mining villages or logging camps or in the stockyard section of Chicago. The church and other social institutions decline. The absentee owner is not interested in contributing largely for adequate church buildings. He uses his influence in many cases to prevent taxation of his property for consolidated schools. Instances have been known in Iowa where the tenants were threatened with eviction if proposals for the establishment of consolidated schools in the country were passed. The absentee landlord does not contribute to the support of the pastor. The interest of the transient tenant is but temporary and he can not be persuaded to give largely to the church. As one tenant expressed it, new buildings had been going up in four communities where he had been located in the past few years.

Transient rural populations.—In addition to the transient tenant, modern agriculture presents the problem of 100,000 agricultural laborers who move from one state to another in the great wheat belt, and remain in one place but a short time during the harvest season. No church, local or otherwise, has an adequate program for the spiritual welfare of this group. Indifference to them as aliens to the local community has characterized much of their treatment. Is it any wonder that they are antagonistic to the church, the state, and organized society?

6. The Cut-over Timber Lands

In Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, in western Washington and Oregon, and in other great lumber sections of the North, West, and South, the passing of the timber has left vast expanses of so-called cut-over lands. Most of this land is good for agriculture and is sold by timber companies at low figures. The cost of clearing the land of stumps and undergrowth, however, is such as to tax the resources of the settler for many years. He is, in fact, in the same condition as the pioneer in the Ohio Valley a century ago. In those days, with practically no capital, the settler had to live almost entirely on the products of his own small patches of cleared land until he could clear more acres and develop resources by thorough thrift and saving. So with the cut-over land pioneer of today. He can hardly support himself and has no surplus left

Deserts like this can be made to blossom by the scientific storage and distribution of water, as illustrated at the bottom of the next page for schools and churches, yet he and his family need the ministry of the gospel. Failure to help now will result in communities like many in the West, indifferent to things religious. Co-operation now will result in communities strong, public spirited and Christian.

Developments in the cut-over lands of today, however, are much more rapid than in the pioneer communities of an earlier day. In the first few years of hardship, we are fully justified in granting missionary aid for the development of his church life.

7. Irrigation and Drainage Projects

Where empires are made to order.—It requires no prophetic vision to see the make an investment. Payments on the land must be made annually. Farm equipment must be purchased. The law requires that schools and public improvements be provided.

All classes and all denominations are abundant evidence that the future reclamation of land through irrigation is far to exceed in area all previous achievements. The experimental stage has been passed. Through government aid, the obstacles have been conquered.

Frontier conditions obtain wherever a new irrigation project is thrown open to settlement. The settler comes to found a home, not to Church-aided schools in the Tennessee Mountains represented. The Mormons are very energetic in establishing colonies in the rich irrigation areas.

Quick and liberal action by some church is necessary if responsible religious work is to be established. Our form of episcopal supervision makes our church peculiarly responsible for the sending of missionaries and the founding of churches in such frontier regions.

The settlers respond.—The settlers on the great irrigation projects, with every shade of religious ideals or lack of ideals, are aggressive and intelligent. Live wire government representatives aid them in successful conquest of soil and climatic conditions. They will respond to an adequate church program.

Drainage projects.—An inter-state commission headed by Secretary Herbert Hoover is now pushing forward plans involving the opening of millions of acres of new lands.

It is estimated that there are in the United States 90,000,000 acres of land now in swamps or under water which can profitably be reclaimed through drainage. The soil in these drainage sections is very rich.

Although a purely missionary work under purely missionary conditions is now necessary, these districts will develop into small farm communities with landowner operation.

8. The Highlanders of the South

Where time slips back.—Along the southern portion of the Appalachian mountains, extending into northern Georgia and Alabama, live three or four million descendants of the original English, Scotch, Irish, and French colonists. This area, called the "Southern Highlands" contains, according to different authorities, between one hundred and two hundred counties in eight states centering in Kentucky, Tennessee, and North Carolina. The problems are isolation, illiteracy, and arrested development.

The accompanying map shows the need of this region educationally, and from a broad point of view, it also shows the challenge for a religious service touching all phases of the people's life. According to the data presented in a reliable school directory for 1921, the counties colored dark have no privately aided secondary schools. Thirteen counties have but one high school each. Seven have no high schools of any kind. Five counties have not more than twenty-five per cent of their population belonging to church as compared with forty-four per cent for the United States. Such church service as is rendered is often of the once a month type given in good weather by a non-resident minister. The circles indicate where the Methodist Episcopal Church should begin a far larger work of purely missionary service in this critical period.

Real home missions.—The Southern Highlands have certain characteristics that make them a purely missionary territory requiring long and adequate support to produce permanent results. Among those characteristics are the following:

A community center for southern Highlanders

An appreciated church service to a transient harvest hand

a. Poverty.—The crudest, most elementary types of agriculture still prevail. Here the home is still a self-sufficient, independent unit, where homespun clothes and knitted stockings are produced by the women, and the men range forest and stream for their food supply, or wrest it from tiny garden patches that seem about to slip their moorings and go sliding down into the valley below. Housing still consists of log cabins with plain homemade furniture. There is little trade and very little money in circulation from one year's end to the other. Only seven rural churches in the Holston Conference in Tennessee have more than one room. Six of these are the result of the Centenary. The average value of rural churches is about $1,200.

b. Indifference to religion.—Contrary to popular impression, the facts indicate that the highland counties are neglected religiously. Ten counties of the Holston Conference have not more than twenty-five per cent of their population belonging to any church and everywhere church membership is below the average. A small proportion of the people are exceedingly religious in an emotional way, but the masses are untouched. Large portions of this country are without religious service of any kind, many of the people being so isolated that it would be impossible for them to attend worship.

c. A free salvation.—In harmony with the economic conditions, the section is burdened with the philosophy that salvation should be absolutely free. Consequently we must assist in supporting trained pastors until they can build up a new and better basis of support for the church.

d. A worn-out circuit system.—Methodism here is still bearing the burdens of the survival of an excessive preaching point circuit system. In common with other denominations it has too much once-a-month absentee pastoral service. The parish plan must be substituted. This section has good stock, it has good economic possibilities when rightly developed. It will require a church program that touches life educationally and economically as well as spiritually.

9. The Rural Leadership Training Movement

The General Conference of 1916 directed the Department of Rural Work of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension to encourage the teaching of rural sociology in our schools. The purpose of this provision was obviously to counteract the undue emphasis upon urban life, to give proper emphasis to the importance of rural life, and to present to the students an adequate view of the opportunity for life service which rural America offers to the college student.

The organization of the religious and social life of our smaller communities is as important a service as is the improvement of economic welfare. But as yet it has been practically untouched. For many years the Board of Sunday Schools has maintained a staff of field workers and they have accomplished great results in improvement of methods of religious education. The demand now is for the expansion of such extension work to touch all phases of religious life and service.

The Directors of Rural Extension Work connected with the Methodist educational institutions and affiliated with the Department of Rural Work of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension are almost the only representatives in the educational work of this type of service. They have not been at work long. There is no experience to guide their policies. It is a pioneer movement.

The types of work now being done by Directors of Rural Extension Work is quite varied. Some of these may be mentioned and an estimate made of their place in the permanent organization.

Teaching.—All rural leaders are engaged in some form of teaching in the institutions with which they are connected. In all cases, courses related to rural church and community life have been offered. The present task to be done is that of standardizing their courses.

The conventional prejudice against rural work as a life service still remains as a challenge to most of the group. In the face of difficulties, encouraging progress has been made. At Boston University, a large proportion of the best theological seminary graduates are specializing in rural work. At Garrett, out of one hundred students who recently expressed themselves as to the type of work in which they wished to specialize, twenty-seven chose the rural work and twenty-one the urban. The others were distributed among religious, educational, foreign and other special types of service.

Supervision of student pastorates.—Theoretically no student should be permitted to carry full work in an institution and draw full salary on a country charge independent of all control by the educational agency whose existence has made the student pastorate possible. Neither should any student be permitted to continue indefinitely at low salary on a rural charge that should have full time service at an adequate salary. These principles apply to colleges as well as to theological seminaries. If the student pastorate is to serve effectively for training purposes, and if the interests of rural communities are to be conserved, student pastors must be required to give a definite minimum of time to their charges; to follow out a definite program of training that will be helpful to him and valuable to his charge; to limit the number of courses taken in the institution so that he can give real pastoral service to the charge.

Some progress has been made. Many student charges have been brought to self support. The problem of establishing rural training stations has become recognized, so that students taking training for rural work may work under the direction of trained rural ministers.

Survey.—In laying the foundation for a national service for rural work the Department of Rural Work has been carrying on a survey of rural life. This survey has been designed to discover the location of every church of every denomination, the residence of every pastor, whether churches are located in villages or in the open country, circuit systems, and other facts that would enable us to reorganize rural service in harmony with present rural conditions and to plan for the advancement of the work of the church to communities and to homes not now definitely served by any church.

Research.—The department has been encouraging in every possible way the development of scientific methods of study. There is need for the still further encouragement of research work in all our higher institutions of learning. Many problems are awaiting solution.

Summer Schools and Epworth League Institutes.—The Directors of Rural Extension Work have furnished almost the entire staff for the presentation of the problems of rural life in Epworth League institutes and in our summer schools for country pastors.

Rural ministers' seminars.—A number of the men have been trying out the plan of holding meetings at selected points in their territory to which ministers would come at least once a month for study of their local problems.

Week-day religious education.—In co-operation with the Board of Sunday Schools, a number of the directors have been experimenting with religious education for rural communities. This work has taken the two forms of vacation Bible schools and the establishment of special courses for religious education in co-operation with the public schools. Foundations have been laid for a safe and rapid advance in this form of rural church work.

10. The Rural Demonstration Parish

Legislation.—The General Conference of 1916 directed the Department of Rural Work "to apportion such funds as may be appropriated for this purpose to strategic centers widely distributed throughout the country for a given period of years and thus to demonstrate the service such a church enterprise can render."

Future needs.—The critical period of the war called for all available Centenary funds for sustentation purposes and this very important feature of the work of the department has been neglected for the lack of funds. In the future a special fund should be made available for the department, in co-operation with the Department of Frontier Work, which can be used in the support of those rural projects under carefully trained and selected leadership that offer co-operation in the development of modern methods of church work. The development of these projects requires a sufficient amount to cover church buildings, parsonages, equipment and necessary maintenance to show what can be done under trained leadership with adequate support.

9. SUMMER AND WINTER RESORTS

The resort churches are located at places in the United States which, because of special attractions, become centers of rest, healing and recreation for large numbers of our people during the extreme weather of the summer and winter months. The permanent or "native" colony of a summer or winter resort is usually relatively small compared with the influx that the "season" may bring. The permanent colony may find itself literally swamped by the coming of a large number of people, who in the majority of cases, are more disposed to forget their religious obligations than they are to remember them. If some special effort is not made, such people by their very presence, will inevitably depress for the time being and probably permanently the religious life and activities of the resort.

These resort populations constitute a challenge and an opportunity for the religious forces of the town or region, but the opportunity and the challenge can only be met by adequate resources. The indigenous resources are usually inadequate, hence the need and wisdom of co-operation by the general church.

The survey reveals that there are about fifty of these resort projects scattered all over the United States. As might be expected, California, Florida and certain sections of the Atlantic Coast present the most needy and the most appealing of these half hundred opportunities.

10. EDUCATIONAL AND MILITARY RESPONSIBILITIES

1. Student Centers

A neglected opportunity.—There are 112 state and municipal colleges and universities in the United States and 560 other private institutions of similar grade. The available statistics indicate that at least 100,000 young Methodists are attending these schools. Nearly three-fourths of these Methodist young people in non-Methodist institutions are in groups ranging from fifty to twenty-five hundred. Until within recent years the church has done little or nothing to minister directly to these young people. Something of the result of this neglect is suggested by the fact that ninety-two per cent of the college-trained men in Methodist pulpits come from the Methodist schools while only eight per cent come from all other colleges and universities including state, independent and denominational schools. For many years more Methodist young people have gone to non-Methodist colleges than to Methodist colleges and universities. At present there are at least sixty of these non-Methodist institutions each enrolling more than three hundred Methodist students.

The Wesley Foundation.—The work of the Wesley Foundation is designed to bring friendship, social opportunity and vocational counsel and religious training to Methodist young people at the impressionable college age while they are attending tax-supported and independent institutions. In connection with the carrying out of the program, the local Methodist Episcopal churches are used as laboratories for training students in Christian work. Special class groups for the study of various phases of the religious life are provided and a wide range of social activities is carried out.

This work, at present developed by the Joint Committee of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension and the Board of Education, reaches fifty-five institutions and employs twenty-eight full time workers. An annual expenditure of $150,000 for general maintenance for such work would hardly be adequate to do the work efficiently at the centers already organized. It is conservatively estimated that with the development that will come to religious work among Methodist students at non-Methodist institutions, there should be an increase of at least $15,000 a year for the next ten years bringing the total annual budget up to $300,000 by the year 1933.

The provision for buildings.—The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension has been charged with the sole responsibility for providing adequate equipment in the way of churches, community houses, and residences at tax-supported and independent institutions. During the three years, 1919-1922, the Board has been able to give substantial assistance to twenty-four institutions. At three of these it has co-operated in the purchase of adequate and desirable sites on which it is hoped buildings will be erected in the near future. At twenty-one such centers it has made possible the erection of suitable buildings.

It is most urgent that during the ten years following the Centenary period, suitable property and equipment be secured so that Methodist students may have proper religious care.

Foreign students.—The Wesley Foundation makes it possible to do for foreign students what we have never been able to undertake previously, namely to give them a sympathetic and personal interpretation of the Christian religion as they pursue their academic work so that they may not return to their native lands more pagan than when they came.

At Negro schools.—Attention should also be called to the fact that the Wesley Foundation idea must be made to apply to those schools ministering to Negro Americans where there is an increasing tendency for students to be indifferent toward and to drift away from religion and its influence. At present there is not a single Methodist Episcopal Church for Negroes in any large Negro educational center, adequately prepared by location, building, equipment and leadership to minister to the Negro students whom it should reach.

The Wesley Foundation program is at present a most excellent beginning of a task whose importance can scarcely be overemphasized. The young people in our colleges are the finest that we have; they are the leaders of the future in almost every line. We must not permit them to spend four of the most important years of their lives out of touch with the church and its interests. Instead we must provide for them the very best we have in buildings, program and leadership.

2. Military and Naval Reservations

A permanent need.—During the World War we were very eager to minister to the soldiers and sailors in cantonments and naval stations. There is still a definite need to continue this ministry at many points. Where we have continued this work, we have not duplicated the efforts of any other church or welfare agency.

11. HOME MISSION LEADERSHIP

Our greatest handicap in missionary work in the United States is the shortage in a leadership trained and adapted to home mission work. Investments in property and equipment are vain without an adequate leadership to make every element in the equipment count toward a definite and complete evangelization of the community.

This shortage is always felt first in our weaker and most needy communities. To meet this situation among the ministry of our church and also to provide trained workers for foreign language, industrial and other groups, the Board has adopted a definite policy.

a. Summer schools.—In order to give specialized training to men now in the ministry, selected young men, who have not had the opportunity of such training, rural and city summer schools have been conducted. Such schools have been from eighteen to twenty days in length. The very strongest men possible have constituted the faculties of these training conferences. During the past three years about 4,000 men have been in attendance and have taken such courses.

b. Higher education.—The board has co-operated with theological seminaries and departments of religious education in certain universities in making it possible to have training given for students preparing for special types of home mission work.

c. Rural leadership.—Departments of Rural Leadership have been established in about thirty of our Methodist schools, thus helping to recruit and train men for service in rural fields.

d. Scholarships.—The board has granted from year to year a limited number of scholarships to selected students who are taking special training for some form of home mission work.

12. EVANGELISM

1. Definition of Evangelism

What is evangelism?—Evangelism is an earnest effort on the part of the

To encourage a responsibility roll in each local church.

To prepare helps in soul winning for personal workers' classes.

To train young people in personal evangelism in summer institutes.

To stimulate the churches to a study and practice of evangelism in its relation to social and industrial problems.

To co-operate with other denominational agencies in evangelistic efforts.

To secure and train intercessors.

To provide leaflet literature to be distributed in attractive form in both English and foreign languages, thus reaching all classes of people.

5. The District Evangelist

Seventy-one district evangelists are now at work under the direction of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, their salaries being paid in part or in full by the board. By this plan, the evangelist is to be paid regularly a stipulated salary. He gives full time under the district superintendent and reports to the Department of Evangelism. Meetings are held mostly in weak and needy churches where the evangelist puts on a definite, constructive all-round local church program.

6. Missionary Evangelism

The missionary evangelist is the herald of salvation in places to which he must be sent from the outside and be practically supported by the board.

Among the 1,500,000 migrant workers in the oil fields, fruit industry, construction camps and wheat harvests, the missionary evangelist is welfare worker, counsellor and guide in many matters, all leading to the highway of the soul.

With the lumberjacks in Tennessee, Michigan or northwest, as comrade, friend, adviser, and sky pilot, he is the stabilizer of thought, the buffer for destructive radicalism, and the only approach that the church of Jesus Christ has to a group of unmarried men who feel themselves to be outside the pale. Many of these men the missionary evangelist brings into the fellowship of the church.

In mining camps, like those about Wilkeson, Washington, he organizes community life, stimulates religious activity, and opens Sunday schools and preaching places.

In the South, the Negro missionary evangelist is working in one needy community after another, interpreting religion for the shaping of character, and stimulating to broader vision the ministerial leadership of our colored churches.

The foreign-speaking evangelists labor among the Portuguese on Capé Cod, the Italians in Portland, Maine, the Lithuanians in Chicago, the Japanese in San Francisco and Hawaii, and the Spanish-Americans in New Mexico.

Thus, under varying conditions, among all sorts of folks, the missionary evangelist is helping to bring in the kingdom in ways which the local church is not equipped to do and therefore must be supported by the church at large.

There is also the evangelist who not only wins souls to the kingdom, but also helps the local congregation to put its finances on a firm footing and thus prepare the church for an aggressive evangelistic campaign. One of these evangelists assisted last year in raising a total of $135,000 for new church enterprises and to pay old debts, $25,000 of which was to clear off a fifty-six year debt of $19,500 on which the local people had paid $70,000 interest.

The hospital evangelist or chaplain renders that fine service to the sick and wounded in the hours much given to meditation and reflection, which helps to an appreciation of the relative values of the things of life and the claims of Christ upon their lives.

The forty-one Methodist Episcopal army and navy chaplains find one of their practical points of contact with the Methodist Episcopal Church through the Department of Evangelism, which provides each man with an incidental fund for use in furnishing office supplies, music, flowers, and literature not furnished by the government.

In work among student groups the department co-operates with the Board of Education in promoting the week of prayer, assisting in the organization of gospel teams and in providing evangelistic speakers for our college and other educational institutions. The results of this work cannot be measured in this generation.

The success of street preaching has been very marked in East Harlem, New York, among the radical groups, and in Chicago where a number of city pastors and students of Garrett Biblical Institute in the summer of 1922 preached on the streets and in the public parks of the city. Some of the meetings were very largely attended and some results achieved.

About 800 Methodist Episcopal pastors are availing themselves of the opportunity to deliver short, crisp, vital messages at the noon hour in the shops and factories of our great industrial centers.

Forums are established where opportunity is afforded for free and open discussion of social and industrial questions under Christian auspices. Some remarkable results have already been accomplished. The department assists in securing speakers and helpers for such open forums.

7. Intercession

Intercession is an important factor in all evangelistic effort. The members of the League of Intercession enrolled with the Department of Evangelism are cultivated and helped in definite and united prayer for our great kingdom interests. When the entire membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church unites as intercessors, the day of the Kingdom will be greatly advanced.

8. Evangelistic Literature

The need of evangelistic literature grows apace. These silent preachers go everywhere and are ever ready to deliver their message. The Methodist Episcopal Church needs a variety of tracts for this purpose written in a popular style, printed legibly and in convenient form and issued by the hundreds of thousands. The department is publishing all the literature of this character its budget will permit.

13. FOREIGN-LANGUAGE LITERATURE

A silent messenger.—The need for a constructive Christian foreign language literature for use among various racial groups in America, has long been felt. Many immigrants who will never be able to read English easily or to understand it when spoken in public address can and do read their own mother tongues. Even in the case of those who do learn English ultimately there is often a long period of delay running into years, during which ideas can be conveyed to them in English only in the most imperfect manner. Socialist, atheistic, and other radical groups have taken advantage of this situation to spread communistic ideas and infidelity among these people at a time when, because of their break with the past and its traditions, they are particularly responsive to new ideas. Certain religious groups have also seized upon this method of reaching these new arrivals. Up to date, however, most Protestant agencies have been slow to recognize that American ideas and ideals, including those religious ideas which we most cherish, can and must be interpreted in languages other than our own even in America.

The Committee of Six.—Following the direction of the General Conference of 1916, the Committee of Six on Foreign Language Publications has been hard at work. Already there are available and in use more than a dozen carefully edited pamphlets in from one to twelve different languages. One of these is the "Social Creed of the Churches," a translation of a statement adopted by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America. This is available in Arabic, Czech, Finnish, Italian, Lithuanian, Magyar, Polish, Portuguese, Russian, Slovak, and Spanish. Another is "Facts and Figures Concerning the Methodist Episcopal Church." This leaflet grew directly out of the deeply felt need on the part of a pastor in a

Samples of foreign-language literature provided by the Committee of Six great polyglot community with many Slovaks, Lithuanians, Poles, Ukrainians, Armenians, Syrians and others. "What," said he in desperation, "can I do to make the people, many of whom are anti-religious and are regularly reading the most radical literature, understand that the Methodist Episcopal Church is something bigger than the little wooden building in which I must carry on my work?" The pamphlet is an attempt to help him and many others like him to answer that question in some measure. There are also translations of parts of Fosdick's "The Meaning of Prayer," and "The Manhood of The Master" and other pamphlets such as "The Church and the Working Man," and "Things of First Importance" for special groups.

Interdenominational work.—Co-operating with several other denominations through the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations, bi-lingual Bible lesson quarterlies are already available or in process of publication in the Czech, Italian, Magyar, Polish, Russian, and Spanish languages. Methodist periodical literature is also published in the Swedish, Portuguese, Norwegian-Danish, Slovak, Korean, Japanese, and Filipino languages, the last three being issued in Hawaii. An Italian-English story leaf is designed to enable parents who do not read English to read in Italian the lessons studied by their children in Sunday school. Co-operating with the Home Missions Council and the Council of Women for Home Missions, race studies on "The Czecho-Slovaks in America," "The Poles in America," "The Russians and Ruthenians in America," "The Italians in America," and "The Greeks in America," have been published through the George H. Doran Company. A sixth study, "The Magyar in America" is now in press. These studies are designed to help Americans to understand the background and the problems presented by these various race groups which have come to see how our American experiment in democracy works out.

An important method.—The importance of extending this foreign-language literature work is very great. When we compare the size of our issues with the extent of the field to be reached, we realize that we are but touching its fringes. With added funds we could very greatly extend our sphere of influence and the result of a single pamphlet among these eager seekers after truth, who can foretell? One foreigner with pronounced anti-religious sentiments in the coal fields of Pennsylvania said after reading a pamphlet issued by our Committee, "Well, I thought I was an atheist, but, if that is what Christianity means, possibly I am not an atheist at all." A wise use of our literature in homes and among laboring groups will break down prejudice and drive out erroneous and dangerous corruptions of America and of Protestantism faster than any other method which we can use and the way will be paved for a far more effective work among the rising generation of young people.

14. THE GOODWILL INDUSTRIES

Not charity.—The Goodwill Industries are institutions where cast-off shoes, clothes and furniture collected from the homes and business houses of the community are renovated by people economically or physically unfit to be employed in the regular industries. Under Christian foremen, they become shoemakers, tailors, carpenters, upholsterers, milliners and dressmakers and are fitted for earning a livelihood. The product of their labors while learning a trade is sold at a low price to needy people unable to purchase new goods. During this process of the reconstruction of men and things the message of the gospel is interpreted through chapel worship and personal contact with Christian men and women.

The Goodwill Industries represent the church in promoting business life, scientific and Christian methods of saving the waste in order to provide for the material and religious needs of old, handicapped and unemployed people, many of whom are now alienated from the church by poverty or social and religious prejudice and consider that the church has no message for labor.

It is estimated that from 2,500,000 to 10,000,000 people in America are in poverty and do not have sufficient income from year to year to secure the necessities of life, food, clothing and shelter. On the other hand, enough material is wasted in America to provide an abundance for these millions of needy people if this waste material were properly conserved.

The Goodwill Industries are designed to give the needy, "not charity but a chance", in the self-supporting work of saving the waste materials of the community.

These Industries are business-like in their methods of saving this waste material, so much so, that in a short time after proper provision is made for tools and trained leadership, they become self supporting.

They are so scientific in saving this waste material that they have substituted for menial charity, a chance for the unfortunate to become self supporting and self respecting.

The Goodwill Industries are so Christian in their methods of saving waste material that they literally follow the methods of Jesus in feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, healing the sick in body and mind and preaching the Gospel to the poor.

The Christian method in all ages of the church transcends social, national and religious prejudice. The Goodwill Industries are so operated as to constitute an industrial democracy. The people who work and those who supervise and finance the enterprise, share together the responsibility of the management.

Goodwill Industries are not run for profit but for service.

Goodwill Industries constitute more than temporary material relief. Fourteen trades are taught in the Goodwill Industries run by the Methodist Episcopal Church. Americanization classes are conducted for foreign-speaking people. Day nurseries, kindergartens, music schools, industrial schools, fresh air camps, and

2,749 churches and parsonages in process of construction in 1920, 1921, and 1922, with the help of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension daily vacation Bible schools are maintained for the children.

The Goodwill Industries conduct religious meetings every week day. Where there is no church near to minister to the people, a Church of Good Will is organized for that purpose.

But, a chance.—In 1922, twenty Goodwill Industries reclaimed more than $1,000,000 from waste materials and ministered through their workshops and stores to more than 250,000 needy folks. Nearly 10,000 unfortunate people have turned this waste material into articles of use which 1,000,000 other unfortunate folks, who could not afford new things, purchased at small prices in our sixty-five stores in twenty cities. Fully $500,000 in self respecting opportunity wages have been paid to the 10,000 old, handicapped and unfortunate folks at work in our industries. The foremen, teachers and regular overseers received $250,000 in salaries. Many persons have been remade economically by learning one of the fourteen trades taught in our factories. The Industries constitute the largest Trade School in the denomination. These students could never learn a trade elsewhere. They support themselves and other dependents as they learn. More than 6,000 religious services were held in the Goodwill Industries in 1922.

It would be altogether impossible to care for these unfortunate peoples by any other method. It is either this method or leave them without a chance and without religious opportunity. There are at least twenty-one other cities throughout the country where Goodwill Industries should be organized and carried forward at the earliest possible date.

15. EMERGENCY NEEDS

Calamity cases.—The term "emergency," is used to cover those needs for church extension aid entitled to consideration by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, in which church property has been destroyed in whole or in part, by fire, flood, tornado or other natural calamity, and where such property can not be rebuilt or restored without outside help. In rare cases, since the beginning of the Centenary, other problematic and difficult situations growing out of crop failures or sudden collapse of business enterprises have been relieved by emergency funds. In general, however, emergency funds have been used for real calamity cases and the funds available are scarcely sufficient for anything else. Our experience has again and again demonstrated that it is well worth while to stimulate the work of rebuilding or restoring these destroyed and damaged churches. The aid given in any case is determined by the amount of loss sustained and the resources which the board has available.

NO RETREAT!

The Board of Home Missions and Church Extension steadfastly refuses to beat a retreat and as steadfastly refuses to listen to timid and visionless counsel. It is profoundly convinced that Christ is calling the church to join him in a conquering crusade that shall end only when the social organism has been thoroughly Christianized. The board believes that the great body of Methodists join in this conviction.

I. THE BOARD OF EDUCATION FOR NEGROES

1. GENERAL OBJECT

"The work of the Board of Education for Negroes shall be the establishment and maintenance of institutions for Christian education among the colored people in the Southern States and elsewhere. The instruction in these institutions shall include such literary, professional, and biblical courses of study, and such industrial training as will tend to develop the highest Christian character. These institutions shall be located with reference to an educational system comprising collegiate centers and co-operative preparatory academies, so that with the greatest economy the educational needs of the people may be most fully met. Contributions shall be taken through the church for the maintenance and support of this work, and for this purpose Lincoln's Birthday shall be observed wherever practicable.

"The schools shall be made self-supporting as rapidly as the financial condition of the people will permit. Special efforts shall be made to secure permanent endowments for the various institutions, and the Board of Managers, whenever it is satisfied that the support will be ample, and that the property will be maintained and perpetuated, may convey the control of said schools to a local Board of Trustees."¹

2. ITS PROGRAM FOR THE EDUCATION OF THE NEGRO

A central university.—The Board of Education for Negroes has a well-defined plan for the development of its schools. The program calls for one university at Atlanta, Georgia, in the very center of the South. Plans have already been adopted by the board for the reorganization of Clark University, providing for schools of liberal arts, science, commerce, music, law, also post-graduate courses, the theology and medicine of the university to be done at Gammon Theological Seminary and Meharry Medical College. In providing for post-graduate work, we look toward the training of college presidents, professors and outstanding leaders, not only for our own system of schools, but for the entire Negro educational needs of the country. This work is now entirely done in northern universities.

First-class colleges.—The program calls for not less than four or five first-class colleges located in various sections of the South, so as to provide full college courses within easy reach of the Negro masses.

Because of inadequate funds in the past not one of the institutions now rated as colleges has had a chance for self-determination as to its permanent classification. The system is being maintained as given in this report. With the increased help which now comes from the Centenary and is expected from the program following the Centenary, the policy of self-determination, based upon growth, will permanently fix the number of standard colleges the board may profitably operate.

Moreover, the Southern States are constantly raising the standards of their institutions for the Negro. The board will be compelled for the next five or more years to watch the growth of the schools and the action of the states and other denominational agencies, in order to act wisely.

Junior colleges, institutes, and academies.—The balance of the schools are to be junior colleges and secondary schools, from which will go out school teachers and such of the ministers and Christian leaders as shall find it impossible to secure a full college training and a complete theological course added. Under the conditions prevailing among the Negroes, for a long time to come, the junior colleges and secondary schools must suffice for the great mass, not only of the ministers, but local church leaders as well, such as Sunday-school superintendents and teachers, Epworth League presidents and workers in all departments of the churches.

II. THE NEGRO'S EDUCATIONAL NEEDS

1. REASONS FOR EDUCATING THE NEGRO

a. He is a man entitled to it. It is his inherent right to be trained.

b. Education makes him a producer as well as a consumer.

c. As a producer, he becomes an asset, not a liability.

d. A democracy like the United States is safe when all its people are educated.

e. No people in a country should permanently be left weak. It forms the basis for the destruction of the weak and a handicap of the strong.

2. THE KIND OF EDUCATION FOR THE NEGRO

a. All that the individual is capable of taking.

b. It should cover all phases of life.

c. It should be Christian.

d. It should be thorough.

3. THE PRESSING NEED OF NEGRO EDUCATION

a. There are 10,381,309 Negroes in the United States, or one-tenth of our population, needing mental, moral, spiritual care and leadership.

b. The necessity for qualifying for voting in church and state, requires education. The trend is for educational qualification in and for everything. The Negro without education may become a liability and positive burden to civilization.

c. In fifty-six years, Negroes have made marvelous progress in business. The call is for educated leadership beyond the present capacity of the schools to furnish.

III. NEGRO PROGRESS

1. IN THE PROFESSIONS AND IN BUSINESS

Two Negro medical schools.—There are only two approved institutions for the medical training of the Negro, Howard University, Washington, District of Columbia, and Meharry Medical College, Nashville, Tennessee. For the year 1920-21 Howard University had 459 students in medicine, dentistry, and pharmacy, and Meharry Medical College had 645, or 186 in excess of Howard University.

It is an astounding fact that there are only two medical schools and one law school specifically established for a race of people numbering 10,381,309. No southern state provides for the medical or legal education of the Negro. Schools of the North are open to the race, but restrictions are on the increase, by which he is either prohibited or advised to seek training at one of the Negro schools.

The limit has been reached at Meharry Medical College in the accommodation for students. The increase of the endowment to $1,000,000 is imperative. The Methodist Episcopal Church, through the Board of Education for Negroes, has contributed $300,000 for the expansion and endowment of Meharry Medical College, and now enters $10,000 per annum in its budget of askings, that the school may retain the rank of Class A.

One Negro law school.—In 1920-21, there were 60,000 business operations by the Negro. These consisted of banking, insurance, grocery, real estate, etc. The taxable property of the Negro is valued at $1,500,000,000. With this accumulation comes the need of the Negro lawyer, and yet there is but one Negro law school from Washington to Los Angeles. The only Negro institution conducting a law department is Howard University, with 72 students in 1920-21.

The board contemplates the organization of Clark University, with the inclusion of a law department as one of the imperative needs.

2. IN RELIGIOUS LEADERSHIP

The religious status of the Negro in 1920-21

Churches	45,000
Ministers	37,000
Communicants	4,800,000
Sunday schools	46,000
Sunday-school pupils.....	2,250,000
Church property value.....	$90,000,000

Alarming facts.—As gratifying as the above showing may be in fifty-six years of freedom, there are some alarming symptoms in the facts when analyzed. Of the 10,381,309 Negroes in the United States, but 4,800,000 are enrolled as members of churches. The Negro has been hitherto regarded as our most religious race.

There are but a few over one half as many Sunday-school pupils in Negro churches as there are Negro church members. Where are the children of this hitherto deeply and openly religious race?

Negroes in theological seminaries.—Of the 37,000 Negro ministers, 20,317 are Baptists and 15,171 Methodists. With the exception of 1,779 Negro ministers in the Methodist Episcopal Church and 1,014 in the Protestant Episcopal, Presbyterian and Congregational Churches, the bulk of Negro ministers, numbering 34,207, belong to the distinctively Negro Methodist and Baptist bodies. In all the theological institutions and departments for the training of Negro ministers there are now 910 students. Of these, 114 were reported in Gammon Theological Seminary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which was the largest number in any one theological institution for Negroes. Of the total number of 910 Negro students in the 36 theological institutions and departments, 346 are in nine institutions operated by northern boards, and the Southern Presbyterian Church.

There are 1,152 students in the Negro medical colleges, as compared with 910 in Negro theological seminaries. The rating of the medical schools is far above that of two thirds of the theological seminaries.

Not more than one fourth of the 37,000 Negro ministers can be said to have adequate training for leadership.

Need of a trained ministry.—The outstanding need of the Negro race is a trained ministry. Gammon Theological Seminary at Atlanta, Georgia, has been a mighty lever of power for the Negro race. The imperative need is expansion in buildings and endowment, in order that the seminary may do its largest work in theological and extension courses. Any money expended here is an investment that will yield. The Centenary income of over $400,000 per year from Negro conferences is directly attributable to the Negro ministerial leadership from Gammon Theological Seminary and other institutions.

Summer institutes.—Great and permanent good has been done in the work of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, in providing rural institutes for Negro conferences, wherein the ministers and lay leaders are brought together at Wiley College, Morgan College, and Clark University for two or three weeks of study each summer. It has stimulated the ministry and membership of our Negro conferences.

IV. THE ONLY SOURCE OF LEADERSHIP FOR THE NEGRO RACE

A trained leadership imperative.—No race can come to its own without trained leadership. The one source is the institution of learning. The success of fifty-six years in producing a leadership for the race warrants the continuance of the work as the source of supply.

When we were called to war, it was the educated Negro of our Methodist schools that made possible the large contribution of Negro forces to the victory achieved. The Methodist Episcopal Church had educated a Negro leadership, so that one of its graduates guided the entire race in its relation to American forces at home and overseas.

Every board of the church is dependent upon our Negro institutions for the working of its program at home and abroad.

V. CHURCH AND STATE EDUCATION FOR THE NEGRO

Religious value of church education.—It has been said over and over that but for the denominational institutions begun and continued in the South for the Negro people, the wisdom of educating the Negro never would have been discovered. Hence the forward movement in the South by the state for the education of the Negro may be justly considered as one of the victories of northern philanthropy. Now that there are one or more state institutions in every southern state for the education of the Negro, along with our schools, each is finding its place in a definite way. The Christian school is preparing Christian leaders for all, and the more emphasis placed upon the Christian basis, the better. The religious revival in our schools where young people are sought to become converts and followers of Christ is unknown to the state school.

One of the institutions of our church, situated alongside of a state school, had such a religious revival among the students that it influenced the state school and conducted the revival for both, by having the state school students join in the meetings.

Denominational schools have found their specific work to be the training of ministers, teachers, physicians, pharmacists, lawyers, and home-makers, leaving the state schools to train the Negro in industry, agriculture, commerce and business. Our Christian schools, therefore, are spending most of their funds in the academic and professional training of the Negro, on the religious basis; and the state is expending large sums in the industrial and handicraft pursuits.

The record for 1921-22, as for 1922-23 includes students in elementary grades. These are being discontinued as fast as the public schools are established and operated for the proper number of months.

² The increase in valuation of property and equipment as follows: $1,228,422 in 1921-22 over 1911-12 and of $1,171,850 in 1922-23 over 1921-22, is due mostly to the Centenary and the wise expenditure of such funds by the Board in realty purchases and expansion.

¹ The School Income for 1922-23 cannot be given as we are in the beginning of the year when this report is made.

Accurate accounting of funds.—The Board of Education for Negroes is constantly studying the best and most approved methods to secure accurate accounting for the funds of the church appropriated for the education of the Negro and of student fees. The board receives the following formal reports:

Monthly report of president, covering receipts and expenditures.

Monthly report of president, covering student attendance.

Teacher's application blank.

The additional methods of accounting being inaugurated will bring weekly to the office of the board duplicate ledger accounts of bursars. In this way the office will know every week the business of its entire list of schools, and check any irregularity promptly. The success of our schools in the last ten years has been due in no small degree to the improved business methods in their conduct.

VII. WHAT THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH MUST DO FOR NEGRO EDUCATION IN THE NEXT TEN YEARS

1. STANDARDS THAT MUST BE ATTAINED

Standardizing agencies.—The Board of Education for Negroes of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the conduct of its institutions, must meet the requirements of standardizing agencies in the educational world. Negro institutions must now measure up to the same standards as white institutions, in order to have the credits of their graduates accepted in Class "A" institutions. The standardizing agencies which cover the institutions of the United States in general are as follows:²

The Association of American Universities.

² List of approved Colleges of Arts and Sciences and Junior Colleges—compiled by the American Medical Association, January 15, 1922.

The Council on Medical Education and Hospitals of the American Medical Association has published a list of Negro Colleges in Classes I, II, and III. The classification is based upon the findings of the Phelps-Stokes Fund and the United States Bureau of Education in the investigation of Negro institutions of learning.

This investigation, which was made ten years ago, placed most of the schools of the board in Class III, covering entrance requirements for medical colleges.

The board is now having a re-investigation of its institutions, since the great help of the Centenary in the last four years has made possible radical changes in curriculum, large additions to science departments, and increase in libraries. Likewise, the erection of new buildings, increase of teachers' salaries, installing of school furnishings, and additions to endowment are direct results of the Centenary. Meharry Medical College at Nashville has been placed in Class A; Wiley College, Marshall, Texas, is recommended by the Texas State Board of Education for recognition as a Class "A" college, and other institutions of the board are soon to receive the same recognition. Pressure is constantly brought to bear to raise the standards in all institutions of the board.

Educational institutions affiliated with the Board of Education for Negroes

Public school standards.—State boards of education in many of the states where our institutions are located now require teachers in high schools to be graduates of standard colleges having a four-year course; also teachers of elementary schools to be graduates of normal schools, with training from four to six years, the first four in high schools and the remaining one or two in normal or teacher-training courses.

State requirements.—The denominational institutions for the education of the Negro, in order to be upon the accredited lists of State Boards of Education, must be regularly inspected by representatives of the state. They meet state requirements in teaching force, hours of academic work for each semester, laboratory and library equipment, as well as buildings affording adequate space for all such work. When a school is upon the accredited list of a state board, the graduates receive certificates to teach in elementary and high schools without examination. These certificates are presented to the graduates with their diplomas on the day of graduation. In some states, because of reciprocal relations with other states, a graduate is eligible to teach in several states. Graduates of Wiley College have such reciprocal privileges.

Standards of great foundations.—Such agencies interested in the training of teachers and erection of school buildings for the education of the Negro, as the General Education Board, the John F. Slater Fund, the Julius Rosenwald Fund, the Anna T. Jeanes Foundation, the Phelps-Stokes Fund, have secretaries and field agents constantly visiting Negro denominational schools. They note the adequacy or inadequacy of Negro institutions to do the work required. They give publicity to the same, which influences and weakens or strengthens the constituency and friends of the institution in its support.

Church standards.—The institutions of the Board of Education for Negroes, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, are under the direction of the University Senate of the Methodist Episcopal Church by General Conference mandate, and subject to the standards and ideals of the senate.

National association standards.—The National Association of Colleges for Negro Youth, organized in 1913, is to promote high academic standards in college work. The association admits only colleges which have met full laboratory, library and collegiate standards, generally accepted by the best standardizing agencies. The importance of a compulsion of this sort to exact high-grade curricula cannot be overestimated. And Negro schools must not lag behind in quality.

Two hundred six thousand five hundred forty-five have been enrolled and 31,560 have been graduated from educational institutions. The public school system of the South has been supplied with 15,241 teachers.

Among our graduates there are such outstanding leaders as an assistant secretary to the Secretary of War, an assistant to the United States attorney-general, a one time registrar of the United States treasury, a United States minister to Liberia, scores of college presidents in our own and other institutions, and leaders of large insurance and business corporations.

In this event the amount asked plus the income from sale of property will replace the institution on a new site. If the institution remains on present site the amount of $200,000 will be needed to erect necessary buildings.

The Negro lawyer who secured a decision from the Supreme Court of Maryland against the famous Baltimore segregation ordinance was graduated from one of our schools.

The Negro lawyer who pleaded and secured a decision of the United States Supreme Court on a phase of the Southern disfranchisement acts, was a law student at old Central Tennessee College, now Walden College.

One third of all the Negro physicians, pharmacists and dentists practicing in the United States, have graduated from Meharry Medical College, Nashville, Tennessee.

In Atlanta, Georgia, graduates of our schools include:

- 48 physicians and dentists;
- 30 public school teachers;
- 10 ministers;
- 1 real estate agent;
- 8 clerks in government and other service;
- 16 housewives; besides proprietors of drug and grocery stores, and chiefs of departments of insurance.

This kind of service can be duplicated in Chicago, New York, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, New Orleans, Birmingham, Jacksonville and every large city of the South.

From Claflin College have gone:

- 250 tradesmen;
- 300 business men;
- 79 musicians;
- 18 lawyers;
- 78 ministers;
- 6 foreign missionaries;
- 430 high and elementary school teachers;
- 53 doctors;
- 6 nurses;
- 14 dentists; and
- 6 pharmacists.

This is but a sample of what has happened in each of the institutions during its history of service.

In Flint-Goodridge Hospital at New Orleans, Louisiana, 1,052 bed patients and 8,200 outside cases were ministered to from July 1, 1921 to July 1, 1922. During the same time there were won for Jesus Christ, 212. All the results are beyond any power to tell.

2. THE PROGRAM JUSTIFIED BY THE RESULTS

Justified by results.—During the Centenary period the schools of the Board of Education for Negroes have been able to do more than ever toward reaching educational ideals and arriving at the place of large usefulness, befitting the great church and the need everywhere before us.

The Brother-in-Black has justified by results all the help given to him. He still needs the loving, substantial support of the great church to bring him to the day of full development, a blessing to himself and to others. His is a missionary appeal, vindicated and justified by results secured.

The program is just begun. Methodist Episcopal schools for Negroes must be the equal of any for that race anywhere. And in this strategic advance, our great and good church must "carry on."

I. THE FUNCTIONS OF THE BOARD

"The object of the Board" is to promote "ministerial and general education." The methods and extent of the work as prescribed and suggested by the law of the church¹ may be grouped under three heads, aid to institutions, co-operative relations and general service.

Aid to institutions.—The location and organization of new institutions of learning in the Methodist Episcopal Church are subject to the approval of the board. It has an "advisory relation to the business and educational management" of all our institutions of learning; it is charged with "devising ways and means" for aiding them in financial undertakings; it must "receive and disburse such funds as may from time to time be committed to it," the largest of these being the public educational collection; it is required to receive and securely invest certain funds, in effect endowment funds, for the benefit of educational institutions and "other educational agencies under the patronage of the Methodist Episcopal Church;" and it exercises special responsibility for the maintenance and administration of the southern schools for white students.

Co-operative relations.—The Board of Education has co-operative relations "with the Board of Bishops in the work of the Commission on Courses of Study," nominating three members of the commission and helping to "provide funds;" with "the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension in the care and religious training of Methodist students at tax-supported and independent" educational institutions; with conference educational societies in providing and administering loan funds for students; with the Board of Education for Negroes in supplying from its staff an educational director for the schools of the Negroes; with the University Senate, which fixes standards and classifies institutions, as the executive agency and financial support of the senate; with the Educational Association of the Methodist Episcopal Church as adviser, executive, and representative in similar bodies; with the Association of American Colleges and the American Council on Education as a constituent member, helping to determine general educational policies and procedure; and with the Council of Church Boards of Education by contributing to its budget and sharing actively in its work of investigation, publicity, and promotion.

General service.—The general service of the board consists mainly in preparing and publishing statistical and other educational treatises; in helping teachers to find positions and schools to find teachers; and in administering the loan fund derived from the Children's Day collection. This fund is absolutely restricted in use to the one purpose of aiding students. It grows larger each year, and the beneficiaries now number more than 30,000. The board serves also in a great many matters that cannot be classified.

II. METHOD AND SCOPE OF THESE STUDIES

Annual budget reports.—The law of the church requires every educational institution asking an appropriation from the public educational collection to submit to the Board of Education, as a basis for its request, a budget for the year in which the help is asked and a complete statement of the income and expenditure for the preceding year. These budgets and statements, when compared with financial reports for earlier years, furnish the best basis for such estimates as are here submitted.

A budget is a list prepared beforehand of all expected receipts and expenditures for the coming scholastic year. It is itemized closely and, under proper administration, is remarkably accurate. One of our schools¹ having an annual expenditure of more than $1,000,000 reports that in eighteen years it has seldom had a deficit, that it has never had one that was

¹ The word "school" is used, except when plainly limited, to include secondary school, college, university, and professional school.

Increase in enrolment, expenditures, and per capita cost, 1913-1921 not foreseen, and that the maximum deviation from budget estimates has not exceeded three per cent.

Budget forms prepared by the board are used by all our educational institutions. The accounting of their finances is reduced to a careful system and estimates based upon budgets checked against each other year after year are dependable in the highest degree.

Other figures necessary for comparative purposes were obtained from reliable sources such as the General Education Board, the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, and the United States Bureau of Education.

Comparative income.—Financially our schools are not as well off as the larger support now given to them would indicate. The aggregate income has increased, but the number of students has increased largely and the expense per student has nearly doubled. At the same time, general school standards have been rising rapidly. The gap between assured income and necessary expense is proportionally larger than eight years ago.

Expense of the school year, 1921-22.—The aggregate maintenance expense of the schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church of all grades, except schools in the South and some professional schools of independent financial organization, is $11,151,003. The assured income from all sources, including the present public educational collection, is $9,717,407. The schools needed $1,433,596¹ more than they received from dependable sources.

Provision for maintenance.—How can such a need be met? In recent years it has not been fully met. But much of it has been covered by generous gifts from the General Education Board, (such gifts soon will cease), and by the unremitting toil of presidents and financial agents in securing extraordinary and therefore temporary sustentation funds. They should be relieved of a part of the burden of raising current funds in order that they may have more time and energy for other work of great importance.

¹ Figures for the school year 1922-23 will not be complete until July or August, 1923.

The usual income of our educational institutions consists of interest from endowments; fees paid by students; miscellaneous contributions; special collections in the churches; and the public educational collection.

Income from endowment and fees paid by students is relatively dependable. The other kinds of income are subject to sudden fluctuations which can neither be foreseen nor prevented. Since our schools have immediate and essential needs which cannot wait for the slow process of increasing endowment and student fees, their success depends largely upon increasing and stabilizing other kinds of income. What may reasonably be expected from each kind?

1. Interest on endowment

Our schools always have solicited funds for buildings, equipment and endowment. They will need to continue soliciting by private methods and public campaigns. Endowment furnishes an essential element of stability. But providing for current needs by endowment is slow and in some cases impracticable. Subscriptions usually are payable in instalments extending from three to five years. After they are collected, the funds must be invested and another year passes before the interest is due. Again, endowment sometimes can not be obtained. That is generally true of schools on the frontier. Some institutions will secure endowment rapidly enough to insure steady and effective service. Others quite as worthy and as necessary to the church will not. The Board of Education should have money to help them. It should also have sufficient funds to use in equalizing educational conditions throughout the church as a whole.

Soldiers' Memorial Hall, Mount Union College

2. Fees paid by students

Fees have been very generally increased since the war, and in many cases are quite as high as they ought to be. Some Methodist colleges are now charging $200 for tuition in addition to other fees. Rates ought not to be increased so as to bear too heavily upon students, many of whom are poor. No large increase in income toward current expense seems obtainable from this source.

3. Miscellaneous contributions

Nearly all educational institutions receive help from miscellaneous contributions from former students and other friends of the institution. Such income is uncertain and usually small in amount.

During the last two years our schools have shared largely in the famous "Christmas gift" made by Mr. John D. Rockefeller for the relief of teachers. The General Education Board, which administered the fund, appropriated to Methodist schools $564,000 for the years 1920-22. Help from this source is rapidly diminishing and soon will end, since the fund was intended to be exhausted in a brief period.

4. Special collections in the churches

A few of our institutions receive some help, and a very small number receive large help, through special collections in addition to the public educational collection taken in the churches of the patronizing territory. This method, except in cases of the very greatest need, is questionable. Special appeals, however necessary at times, and the duplication of collections widely throughout the church may seriously hinder the united financial appeal.

5. The public educational collection

The church undoubtedly intended the public educational collection to cover the necessary current expenses in so far as they are beyond the ability of the schools, and also to meet the cost of special work committed to the Board of Education.

6. Can expenditures be reduced?

Instructional costs make up about one-half of the total expenditures. They cannot be reduced without cutting salaries, overloading teachers, and diminishing both service and standing. Salaries in our schools average about one-third lower than in state schools. It is hardly possible to ask more of the missionary spirit from our teachers. In justice the salaries should be increased. Departments of instruction often are undermanned and in many instances are merged where they ought to be divided. Very few teachers are carrying less than the maximum load allowed in accredited colleges. Reduction in the number of teachers means eliminating departments and restricting attendance. Operating costs probably will recede slowly, but there is no early prospect of important changes. The present trend is slightly upward.

The expenditure per student in our colleges is at present less than the amount approved for the standard college. The savings that may be made in operating costs will be more than offset by the added expense due to educational requirements fixed by the standardizing agencies. The flood of students also will continue to swell. Additional students require more expense, for almost without exception our schools are running at full capacity with their present faculties and facilities. The budgets of our schools need expansion instead of reduction. Greater economy means a loss in prestige and efficiency. It also means limiting the opportunities of Methodist young people. Many who want to go to Methodist colleges to fit themselves for Methodist service will be excluded.

A real emergency.—During the last eight years the expenditures of our schools have increased nearly twice as fast as the normal income. Such a ratio cannot continue, but it is obvious that the total expenditure cannot be reduced without diminishing the service and injuring the prestige of Methodist educational institutions.

Students in multiplying numbers seek admission to our schools. Several thousands were turned away in 1922. Among them may be hearts "pregnant with celestial fire," nobly ambitious youth whom the church will miss its chance to train into the Bashfords, Thoburns, and Motts of the future.

Restrictive economy in education is the costliest economy the church can practice. It puts too heavy burdens upon the gallant men and women who by sacrifice as real as in any field of church work have made education in Methodist schools possible for so many thousands of Methodist young people. It also deprives the church of the trained and consecrated lives that it increasingly needs at home and abroad.

Educational institutions of the Methodist Episcopal Church

The annual need.—In the school year 1921-1922, our colleges and schools had an aggregate difference of $1,433,596 between necessary expenditures and dependable income from endowment, student fees, and the present guaranteed public educational collection. We have found increased income from endowment, from fees paid by students, from miscellaneous contributions, and from special collections, insufficient and in some cases undesirable or impossible. How shall the required income be provided? The safest way for the present is by an increase in the funds allotted to the Board of Education.

2. FRONTIER SCHOOLS

Missionary investments.—In the '80s, churches in the East were giving liberally for the building of little churches and giving something for the building of little colleges for Illinois and Iowa. Today, in Illinois and Iowa, these churches, once little, are giving more to church enterprises than the eastern churches that formerly helped them. In some of the western states we have a very sparse church membership. The Methodists in these frontier states are not only few; they have little accumulated wealth. At present they cannot support properly—even modestly—the educational institutions essential to the welfare of their families and the growth of the church. They need immediate and generous help as missionary enterprises.

In the deficits reported, the frontier schools are included, but if they are to serve the church and do their share in creating great commonwealths, their work must be more generously sustained. Naturally, their normal receipts from the public educational collection are small. These frontier schools and a few elsewhere are proper and promising home missionary and opportunity investments. The money supplied to them now will yield quick and multiplying returns.

Harwood Boys' School, Albuquerque, New Mexico, Built and Maintained by the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension

Urgent needs.— Conditions change from year to year. A statement of needs in 1922 may not correspond with a statement of needs of any subsequent year. Whatever differences may appear in the individual schools the total is likely to increase. If $100,000 had been available in 1922 instead of $40,000, probably there would have been more and larger appropriations to a few of the older schools that have real though temporary emergencies. The amount for that purpose might have reached $24,000. The remaining $76,000 should have been distributed among frontier schools and other schools in missionary territory as follows:

3. SOUTHERN SCHOOLS FOR WHITE STUDENTS

A special charge.—The white schools in the South, most of them in the mountains, were committed by the General Conference of 1908 to the Board of Education.¹ The University of Chattanooga, which is on the borderland, has developed into an excellent college. For a few critical years, the board made to it relatively large contributions which have been fully justified by the high rank the university now is taking and the service it is giving as the center of our educational system in the South.

Current expenses.—The white schools in the South now receiving aid on current expenses from the Board of Education, are listed below. Several local schools which formerly were aided by the board are not included in this list because they now are operating as public schools. For many years church boards thought it wise to share in the support of public schools in order to encourage backward communities to have better schools. The boards now are withdrawing from such work and are transferring whatever properties they hold to the public school authorities.

Institution	Location	Appropriations 1921

The amounts granted on current expenses to these nine schools for alternate years since 1913 are as follows:

1913	$ 7,700
1915	10,550
1917	9,950
1919	28,500
1921	42,900

In 1921, these nine schools raised from friends and received from tuition fees and other sources, $46,279. The Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church gave them $42,900, making a total of $89,179. The number of students was 3,124. The average expenditure per student was $28.55. About half of the students were in the high school, nearly three hundred were of junior college rank, and the remaining with few exceptions were in the upper grades of the grammar school.

The church cannot be satisfied with a per capita expenditure of only $28.55 a year in schools that are objects of its special care as a denomination. This problem deserves immediate attention.

New buildings.—The southern schools need to create modern plants. They have few buildings, and most of them are cheap, badly arranged, and poorly equipped. The deficiency in dormitories limits the range of service the schools can give. Existing dormitories are crowded to the doors, almost to the roofs; often six occupants use one room. Sometimes more applicants are turned away than are received. There is no reasonable doubt that twice as many students would be enrolled if they could be accommodated.

The additional buildings now needed in the nine southern schools would cost about $1,269,000. The total seems large, but it is not when the details are examined. The average amount per school is $141,000, which is less than the cost of the high school building in many small towns.

Building needs.—A list of the additional buildings now needed in the southern schools appears in the table below.

Perhaps one-half of the building fund can be raised by the trustees and principals of the schools. Certainly the remainder must be given by the general church. One hundred thousand dollars a year is a conservative amount.

If these schools are to be a credit to the church, we must continue through many years to provide not only as much as we have recently been expending for equipment and maintenance, but we must increase the amounts. In some of the schools there are possibilities of very great promise. The Athens School, John H. Snead Seminary, Murphy Collegiate Institute, and Washington Collegiate Institute may readily, with adequate support, take a place among the largest and best secondary schools in Protestantism. Union College will develop into an exceptionally good college and preparatory school, a form of organization unusually well adapted to the Kentucky mountain region.

What is done in the South should be well done. Our church schools in the South should be thoroughly good schools. In spite of serious limitations they have done good work. But they must be enabled to do better work. We must furnish our membership, and especially our ministers, with satisfactory opportunities and inducements for a fair education. Our institutions must worthily represent us.

A missionary responsibility.—The Methodist Episcopal Church would not leave these schools as they are if it understood the conditions. Here are a great opportunity and a heavy responsibility for a white membership of 114,000. They seldom are in reach of good public schools. Unless we do our duty they are obliged to depend upon schools poorly equipped, poorly taught, and operated for short terms. They send to our schools 3,000 of their sons and daughters and would send twice as many if we could care for them. On each pupil we spend one dollar a week and the pupil furnishes fifty cents of that dollar. In the North, where the advantages of the greatest public school systems in the world are available, we are spending on each pupil in our Methodist secondary schools one dollar a day. We are not spending too much in the North. And we are not beginning to spend enough in the South. Our problem is, what should we do in the South where we have a real, missionary responsibility?

These schools are in a proper sense a matter of home missions, a missionary effort for a people isolated by geographical location, a people of English, Scotch, and Irish stock who have the intellectual gifts to fill the highest places among us and who are intensely loyal to the best ideals of American life.

In a large part of this territory the average annual salary of the pastors in our churches is less than five hundred dollars. Their school advantages are very limited. Increasingly they look to our secondary schools to serve them and their children. In these secondary schools many candidates for the ministry, among them men who give large promise of leadership, have received the inspiration to go on to college and make fuller preparation for their work. If our church is to stay in the South and our work is to prosper, we must provide very much more liberally than is now at all possible for the training of leaders native to the region.

4. THEOLOGICAL SCHOOLS

Ten theological schools are related to the Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Four are doing special work for foreign-language conferences. The six others are located, two in the East, one in the Middle West, one in the Rocky Mountain region, and two on the Pacific coast.

The list includes:

Institution	Location
Boston University School of Theology	Boston, Massachusetts
Central Wesleyan Theological Seminary	Warrenton, Missouri
Drew Theological Seminary.....	Madison, New Jersey
Garrett Biblical Institute.....	Evanston, Illinois
Iliff School of Theology	Denver, Colorado
Kimball School of Theology.....	Salem, Oregon
MacLay School of Religion, University of Southern California	Los Angeles, California
Nast Theological Seminary (Baldwin-Wallace College)	Berea, Ohio
Norwegian-Danish Theological Seminary	Evanston, Illinois
Swedish Theological Seminary	Evanston, Illinois

Plan of Murphy Collegiate Institute, Sevierville, Tennessee

The new Administration and Recitation Building, Garrett Biblical Institute, Evanston, Illinois

For the whole church.—Three of these six have very modest equipment and little endowment. All of them have serious financial needs. They receive nothing from tuition fees. As a rule, Annual Conferences do not recognize a definite duty to contribute to their support. They “exist for the benefit of the whole church,” but the church as a whole has not accepted the responsibility of providing for them adequate buildings and endowment. Nearly all that they possess has been given by individuals of rare vision and generosity.

The support of the newer theological schools, Iliff, Kimball, and Maclay, is beyond the power of local Annual Conferences or local friends. Their case will be a hard one unless they are helped generously by the church at large. They are in fact missionary enterprises and should be so treated. To do properly the work they now are undertaking for “the benefit of the whole church,” they need additions to their current income averaging about $20,000 a year. Even then they would be spending much less per student than educational authorities regard as necessary. To do other work which they are not now undertaking, but which greatly needs to be done, would add in its beginnings from $5,000 to $10,000 a year to the budget of each school. Allowance must be made for an increased number of students and therefore an increased expense. A conservative total needed for these three schools is $70,000 a year.

Uncertain support.—The older schools, Drew, Boston, and Garrett, are called upon for services beyond their present normal income. They also should have aid from the entire church. They are obliged to resort to high pressure solicitation for special gifts in order to keep the work going. One of these schools presents as its minimum need beyond its assured income, $38,700. Of this amount $24,850 represents annual gifts whose continuance is uncertain and therefore the work is in jeopardy. The remainder is for salaries and library expenses made necessary by the increased number of students and the wider range of the curriculum now required in theological schools. This $38,700 is not for expansion but to guarantee the continuance of the present work. Inevitably there will be expansion in response to the growing needs of the church for trained workers. A careful scrutiny of the report from this school and a comparison with the reports from other theological schools with fewer students and smaller constituencies to serve justifies the conclusion that the estimate of needs is conservative. What is true of this school is practically true of the other two schools. One of them reports needs considerably larger and the other somewhat smaller. The aggregate for the three schools is not less than $115,000. Until sufficient endowment can be secured and that may be far in the future, there is no way to provide for these expenditures above normal income except by contributions from individuals or the church at large. Unless the money is provided the work must be restricted and students excluded, just at the time when the church most needs all the professionally trained ministers it can get, and a multitude of consecrated young people are eager to be trained for service.

A new southern school needed.—The South presents a special case. Here we have 214,000 white members, but no theological school, or special school for the training of our ministry. The work of our church in the South will lack full effectiveness until this gap in our educational system is filled. A school should be established, independently or in connection with one of the existing schools, to train ministers and other specialized workers. The courses and the methods should be adapted to the southern work. The conscious and steady aim should be a product for home consumption rather than export. In connection with one of the existing schools, a satisfactory beginning could be made for $15,000 a year.

5. GRADUATE SCHOOLS

Colleges and universities of the Methodist Episcopal Church usually have had a few advanced students doing graduate work. The courses offered were extensions of departmental instruction rather than parts of an organized graduate curriculum.

Gateway, University of Chattanooga, Chattanooga, Tennessee

Need of graduate schools.—In recent years, universities have found it wise to organize graduate schools. One advantage is the favorable reaction of the graduate school upon scholarship in the university faculty. Another is the ability to supply satisfactory teachers to other educational institutions. In the old day, which has not fully passed, Methodist colleges and secondary schools often were obliged to take the majority of their teachers from graduate schools where the philosophy, ideals, and spirit of Christianity did not prevail. The results very often were exceedingly unfavorable for the church.

In response to pressing demands the universities are expanding the work of their graduate schools in the traditional courses of study, and are establishing new departments or schools in religious education, missions, comparative religions, and related subjects.

A graduate school in religious education.—One of the universities submits the following outline of work that a graduate school of religion or a department of religious education in a graduate school should afford:

1. Training for candidates for the ministry desiring to secure advanced degrees in special fields of work.

Chapel at Ohio Wesleyan, Delaware, Ohio

2. Training for graduate students preparing for positions of leadership in religious education, or community service, such as professors of religious education in our church colleges and training schools; directors of Wesley foundations, of religious education in communities, rural churches, institutional churches, and vacation schools; teachers in foreign mission fields; and directors of community music, pageantry, and recreational activities.

3. Training for graduate students preparing for special mission fields.

In addition to courses in the history of religion and missions, there should be provided courses in history, geography, languages, government of the particular missionary fields and adequate graduate instruction for teachers in missionary schools and colleges.

The cost of satisfactory instruction for all of these courses is estimated at not less than $52,000 a year. Scholarships also would be necessary in the amount of $5,000 to $10,000 a year depending upon the enrolment. The total for a creditable school could hardly be less than $55,000.

The greater part of the work here outlined is being undertaken by one school, but with precarious financial support. Less extensive courses are offered in other places. Much of the program as outlined should be put into effect at once in other universities. The cost in the beginnings should vary from $25,000 to $55,000, the variation being due in large part to the size of the universities and the present development of the work.

The total need for graduate work for the present in the universities is not less than $170,000 a year. As the demand for specialized service increases in the church, the current expense funds of the graduate schools will have to be enlarged.

6. METHODIST SCHOOLS AND CHURCH EXTENSION

Source of leadership.—The church naturally looks to its schools for leadership. Methodism has not been disappointed in this expectation. Bishop Warren once said that "if Wesleyan University had not been founded, the Methodist Episcopal Church would not have attained fifty per cent of its present power."

A chapter from recent history is conclusive.¹ From Methodist Episcopal schools came:

Twenty-one area secretaries out of twenty-four.

Thirty-two members of the Committee on Conservation and Advance out of forty.

Ten members of the Joint Centenary Commission out of thirteen.

Thirty-eight bishops out of thirty-nine.

Forty college presidents out of forty-three.

Ninety-two per cent of college trained Methodist ministers.

Six hundred and three active missionaries (on October 22, 1921) out of 1,185.

An even more remarkable statement from Dr. Kelly is that, for the school year 1919-20, the Student Volunteer Movement reported in training 2,500 missionaries of all denominations. Of these, 471 came from Methodist Episcopal schools. To be entrusted with the training of nearly one-fifth of the missionary volunteers in training for service with all the denominations should inspire our church with both gladness and humility.

Organized Christianity of all kinds relies for the greater part of its leadership upon its own schools. "In the nature of things," says President W. O. Thompson of Ohio State University, "the church will continue to draw the major part of her leaders from her own colleges. My conviction is that the church will be not only a traitor to its own interests but also recreant in its duty to the state if it shall relinquish its emphasis upon the fundamentals of religion which are most effectively taught in denominational colleges."

Missionary leadership.—The extension of education to foreign lands has been due mainly to the denominational schools in the homeland. They furnished the patterns by which the foreign schools were shaped. They trained the teachers, they gave the teachers the vision of missionary service, and they commissioned them to "go and teach" the nations. What can measure the value to China of Bishop Bashford, who clearly saw that his task "meant stimulating reform, introducing modern learning, establishing hospitals, transforming the system of industry, setting up a political government on the foundation of intelligence and freedom, in short, energizing the whole life of the nation by the spirit of Christ"?

The church needs to take the far look, and not to "draw a circle premature." The investment of millions in schools may seem to be a long way around, but it is the surest way home. To conserve the results of mass movements and great revivals, they must be organized, informed, and directed by educated men who think and act in accord with the Christian idealism most effectively taught in our own schools. To what extent will the future of the Christian church be determined by the future of the Christian colleges? The future of Christian civilization certainly will be determined by the future of the Christian church.

7. RELIGIOUS WORK AMONG THE METHODIST STUDENTS IN NON-METHODIST INSTITUTIONS

The United States Bureau of Education reports in this country 112 tax-supported colleges and universities, not including 100 normal schools or teachers colleges granting the B.A. degree, and 516 privately supported colleges and universities, in addition to 43 directly under the patronage of our own church.

Methodist enrolment.—Nearly one in four of the students in the state institutions and about one in ten at the independent institutions reported are Methodists. In 1922 the total state institution enrolment is reported as 250,000 and the independent or privately supported institutions, not including our own, report approximately the same number. These totals indicate that there are at least 75,000 young Methodists attending non-Methodist colleges and universities in the United States.

Our own institutions report a total enrolment of 41,633, of whom about 30,000 are Methodists, bringing our total college student constituency well above 100,000. The fifty-five non-Methodist institutions at which our work is organized, report 35,546 Methodist students in 1922.

In the state institutions reported, the Methodist students lead in point of numbers at forty-nine places, and are second at twenty-two places. In Wisconsin, where only 2.5 per cent of the population of the state are of our church, 15.7 per cent of the university students at Madison are Methodists.

Commencement procession, Wesleyan University, Middletown, Connecticut

At Illinois State University, Urbana, Illinois, out of a total enrolment of 8,743, the Methodist students number 2,166. At Ohio State University, Columbus, Ohio, there are 2,401 Methodist students in a total student body of 8,734.

At Purdue University, Indiana, and at Manhattan, Kansas, the Methodist students outnumber the next four denominations added together. Our largest representation at the independent institutions is at the University of Chicago, where we have at least 1,190 students. In the several professional and graduate schools on the West Side of Chicago the number runs even higher.

Joint board supervision.—The policy of the Joint Committee of the Board of Education and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension created by the General Conference of 1916 for the supervision of this work is to encourage an all-year program of religious activities of, for, and by students and professors, in and through existing churches in order that these students and professors may remain or become active members of the church.

The Wesley Foundation.—Following the precedent established at Urbana, Illinois, and at Madison, Wisconsin, this type of work is commonly known as the Wesley Foundation. A Wesley Foundation is a group of representative Methodists organized or incorporated for the development of religious activities and education among Methodist students at a non-Methodist institution.

A new source of leadership.—While a very large majority of our educated ministers and missionaries have come from our own colleges, it is evident that a large majority of our educated laymen are bound to come in increasing numbers from the tax-supported and other non-Methodist institutions. It is evident, also, from the facts reported to date that a substantial and growing number of recruits for the ministry and especially for the mission fields may be expected from a more extensive and thorough development of Wesley Foundation activities.

The following figures are reported from the work already organized at Wesley Foundations:

	Enlistments for Ministry	Missions
1920.....	45	179
1921.....	67	162
1922.....	73	192

The missionaries actually sailing during the latest full year reported in the Epworth Herald include sixty from the Wesley Foundation field, the high point to date for any one year. For several years at least twenty per cent of the new missionaries actually sailing have come from the tax-supported and independent schools.

Fully 10,000 Methodist students are now voluntarily attending preaching services at Wesley Foundation churches. More than 5,000 are attending Sunday-school classes and a similar number are engaged in Epworth League activities. Hundreds of these students are engaged as Sunday-school teachers and members of gospel teams carrying on evangelistic efforts during their college years.

An adequate student program.—Most of these state institutions are located in relatively small towns or cities where the resources of the local churches are entirely inadequate for a constructive student program. In view of the wide varieties of student groups, no program of standardized details is practicable. The fundamental effort is to provide for a given church an adequate equipment and a competent staff of workers, according to the size of the student constituency, that the students may find at hand a church providing "a shrine for worship," a "school of religious education," a "home away from home," for social activities, and a "laboratory" for training in the service of the church.

At present we have thirty full-time workers, less than one-half of the number needed at the fifty-five centers already reached.

Three hundred students is the number recognized by several denominations as requiring the full-time services of an ordained pastor for students. As a matter of fact, there are a considerable number of institutions enrolling something over two hundred Methodist students where a full-time worker could be used to great advantage.

There is a growing demand at the large centers like Ames, Iowa; Columbus, Ohio; Madison, Wisconsin, and Urbana, Illinois, for religious education courses worthy of curriculum credit. Such courses have been received with marked favor at Ames and Urbana, enrolling a total of nearly two hundred students. An expenditure of $25,000 a year for this specific type of work would meet only the few most urgent calls for building, equipment, and personnel.

Budget requirements.—The budget for the aid of fifty-five churches adjacent to colleges and universities for 1923 is $105,000, which amount is administered by the joint committee, referred to above. An immediate annual expenditure of $150,000 for maintenance would hardly be an adequate minimum for the places already organized and investigated. In view of the unreached places and the rapid increase of students, the state university enrolment having doubled during every decade since 1870, a modest estimate for a ten-year period of conservative development would be at the rate of $15,000 a year, or a total maintenance budget by 1933 of $300,000 a year. These figures make no account of the new buildings needed by Wesley Foundations which are included in the study of the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension.

An urgent appeal.—Thousands of Methodist young people may all their lives be devoted to the church if, during their student years, the church is wisely devoted to them. The great expenditures by the states upon these institutions insure their growing size and quality. The small expenditures required from the churches for the religious atmosphere and ideals the state cannot provide, yield large returns in ministers, missionaries, and educated laymen so essential to progress of the kingdom of Jesus Christ.

8. RELIGIOUS TRAINING IN METHODIST INSTITUTIONS

The Methodist Episcopal Church builds and maintains schools and organizes religious work at non-Methodist schools in

Wesley Foundation, Urbana, Illinois. A co-operative enterprise of the Board of Education and the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension order that our young people may be educated under auspices and influences distinctively Christian and thus fitted for Christian service. How enormous is the need for these training centers is revealed in the study of the leaders required in our church made by the Commission on Life Service. See statement on pages 619-623.

Vocational guidance.—The literature of the church has given little attention to vocational guidance. Fifty-three universities and colleges of the country are making researches in this field. Only two or three of these are Methodist institutions. Doubtless the number will soon increase.

The Board of Education and the Educational Association of the Methodist Episcopal Church now are making a joint study of the problems of vocational guidance. Such a study finds ready the very fortunate provision of forty-four colleges and thirty-five secondary schools, besides professional schools. They afford the best of opportunities to unite religious education and vocational guidance with general education. Through such a union, our own young people may be selected and fitted most effectively for service in the church.

Religious training.—Our schools are undergoing many changes that call for new methods and new forces. Student enrolments are greatly increased and represent a far wider range in the social order than was found at the denominational colleges a generation ago. Multiplying duties of executive heads and faculties render impossible the older methods of religious oversight and direction of these thronging student groups. It is necessary to organize under competent specialized leadership a systematic, unified, and all-year program of religious work and recruiting in our colleges. The Board of Education in co-operation with the Commission on Life Service recently held a number of state conferences with reference to such a program. It was agreed that the board should make this kind of work an annual feature and should organize it so as to reach every college campus of the church during the year.

The plan for religious training and recruiting will involve: the general program of campus religious activities month by month; the curriculum studies in religious education, including Bible study; the voluntary study classes of the campus groups; and, in some respects most important of all, the work and influence of the local churches at our college centers.

The colleges and larger universities need a specialized worker on full time to lead in the vocational guidance and religious training of the students. His work would be quite like that of a Wesley Foundation director at a state university.

The average appropriation for Wesley Foundations is $2,000. A similar amount, assuming a degree of local financial assistance, would be required for such work at our own schools. At present several typical centers are seeking the co-operation of the board. A fund of from $16,000 to $20,000 would provide for these as a beginning and for the necessary supervision. It is clear that successful demonstrations of the plan at even a limited number of places would lead to its ultimate extension among all the institutions of the church. The secondary schools, in view of their smaller size and closer organization, may not require such appropriations for the present. In the forty-four colleges and universities of the church we may expect a rapid increase in the demand for this kind of work and for appropriations toward its support.

9. EDUCATION AND CHRISTIAN CIVILIZATION

Education fundamental. — Education serves the entire church and all of its organizations at home and abroad. In a vital sense it has first importance. Effective work in the home field depends upon trained leadership. Foreign missions require leaders of the broadest training and most vigorous religious life. As education becomes more general throughout the world, college and university training will become essential in an increasing degree to Christian leadership.

The preacher is greater than the pulpit. The missionary is more important than the mission house. The marvelous achievements of the Centenary and the greater things which may be done after the Centenary period will issue in disappointment unless competent leaders can be found to spend wisely the millions given by the church. From Methodist colleges, from Wesley Foundations, and from other church agencies for recruiting and training for Christian service the youth of today will come the leaders equal to the demands at home and abroad in the great new era that now draws near. The process of constructing a better world is under way. Thinkers of every class, notably men of science and business, are seeing more clearly that spiritual elements are essential to civilization. Religion has a new chance to serve. The genius and spirit of Methodism say, "Forward."

IV. WHAT SHOULD THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH DO FOR CHRISTIAN EDUCATION IN THE NEXT TEN YEARS?

1. FORECAST OF DEVELOPMENTS

A significant testimonial.—A letter to the board from R. L. Kelly, secretary of the Council of Church Boards of Education, says: "I have learned with a great deal of interest that the Methodist Board of Education is planning another long step forward for the agencies and institutions of learning of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

"These institutions have already put Protestantism and indeed the nation under lasting obligation because of their marked success in discovering and pointing out permanent elements of educational progress, in comprehending the scope and complexity of the task, and in formulating machinery for its accomplishment. You have been pioneers in many fields of higher education and have shown a remarkable ability to accomplish what you undertake. We all take our hats off in the presence of the dynamic of

Auditorium Conservatory, College of the Pacific, San Jose, California

Cornell Library, Drew Theological Seminary, Madison, New Jersey

Methodist education. May your board and its affiliated agencies long continue to dare and to do.

"In my rather intimate studies of higher education in the United States during the past few years I have often been impressed with and have remarked upon the combination in Methodist institutions of the traditional New England ideals of cultural and religious education and at the same time the inclusion of modern subject matter and methods. Your institutions have shown remarkable adaptability without losing elements which have given stability to higher education in the United States.

"Anyone must recognize, of course, that the carrying forward of such a program as this in view of the uncounted numbers who must receive the benefits of it, calls for the expenditure of vast sums of money. In the interest of Christian education in the United States, I express the hope that your fondest dreams may be realized."

Growth of enrolments and budgets.—High school and college enrolments nearly double every ten years. From 1890 to 1900 the proportion of young people in high school increased about one hundred per cent. There was a similar gain from 1900 to 1910. The figures for 1918,¹ the last available, indicate another doubling between 1910 and 1920. College enrolments increased in a slower but astonishing ratio. They advanced from 55,687 in 1890 to 98,906 in 1900, to 175,893 in 1910, and to 290,106 in 1918. Though full official figures are not obtainable there are many evidences that the rate of increase has risen sharply during the last four years.

The increase in Methodist colleges and universities has not been so rapid. Dependable figures for the earlier period are not available, but the enrolment in six representative colleges has advanced from 3,933 in 1913 to 5,997 for the school year 1922-23. The latter figure is in part an estimate since complete reports of the school year 1922-23 cannot be obtained until July-August, 1923. The gain for the ten years is 52.5 per cent. All Methodist schools advanced in the same period from 39,591 to 56,912, a gain of 43.75 per cent.

What may be expected for the next ten years? During the last decade there has been a rush of students to the larger educational institutions. Many of the universities, both state and private are seriously overcrowded and are trying to limit attendance by direct and indirect methods. There is no doubt that the number of students desiring to go to college will increase at a much faster rate than will the facilities and faculties of the great universities. As a consequence the tide will set more strongly toward the denominational colleges, unless a large number of junior colleges are created (and that is improbable except in a few sections.)

The rate of increase in Methodist colleges is very unlikely to be less during the next ten years than it has been during the last ten years. Accordingly, in 1933 the six representative colleges should have

9,449 students. The total for all of our schools should be 81,811 students. On the modest assumption that by 1933 the cost per capita will at least equal $300.00, the minimum now supported by any authority, the six representative colleges would have a budget of $2,834,700. All the schools, excluding frontier and southern schools with about 1,000 students, would have an aggregate budget, exclusive of buildings and endowments, of $23,043,300.

A budget forecast.—The excess of expenditures over assured income from endowment and student fees, and the public educational collection has steadily increased during the past ten years both in absolute amount and ratio. It is not likely to decrease during the next ten years. The present ratio is 12.8 per cent. Taking that as a basis all the schools exclusive of frontier and southern schools will require in 1933, over and above income from endowment, student fees, and the public educational collection as now guaranteed, $2,949,542 instead of the present $1,433,596. The difference is $1,515,946. Current expenses may be expected to have increased by 1933 by at least $10,000,000, or at the rate of $1,000,000 a year. The amount is more likely to be $1,200,000 a year. But taking the minimum basis of $1,000,000 a year, 12.8 per cent would be $128,000, the annual increase necessary from the church at large or other sources close to the gap between expenses and dependable income.

Estimates conservative.
—All of these calculations concerning the future rest upon the fundamental assumption that the church will maintain its schools in at least their present rank. As rapidly as the educational world goes forward they too will advance. Even so the figures must be regarded as provisional estimates. Too many factors are unknown, and now are unknowable, to permit of mathematical exactness. How much the income from the endowment may increase, how many large gifts may be received, how great may be the unexpected demands, and how many catastrophes may occur no one can tell. But the records of several years have been scrutinized for constant factors and ratios. The estimates throughout are based upon minimum rather than maximum figures and expectations. For example, $300 annual cost per student in 1933 probably is much too low for our schools, including colleges, universities, professional schools, and the few northern preparatory schools but excluding frontier and southern schools. On the other hand it may be too high for a part of the ten year period. But revision of the total figures in 1933 when complete reports are available is likely to be upward rather than downward.

Higher requirements.—More rigid standardizing requirements probably will be put into effect. Our own University Senate has already led the way. The movement has become general among standardizing agencies, national, regional, and denominational. Whatever they prescribe it is practically necessary for our schools to do. The church has no desire to operate discredited schools. It purposes that as good teaching and facilities as may be found anywhere and a tonic esprit de corps shall prevail in the schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

New Administration Building, John H. Snead Seminary

Senior Class, Jennings Seminary, Aurora, Illinois

Increasing standards. — General reference has been made several times to changes brought about by the standardizing agencies. A few specific illustrations may be useful.

1. Equipment

Required equipment is increasingly necessary and expensive. In the old day, before the reign of science, the text-book and the teacher were almost sufficient. But now the sciences have a large place in the curriculum. They demand numerous and costly apparatus. Replacements made necessary by breakage and by improved patterns are large. Additional apparatus required by new discoveries and inventions are frequent, in fact, almost constant. Moreover, the scientific method has extended to other subjects. Psychology demands a laboratory, and sociology a clinic. All the recognized subjects require large, "live, well-selected, and professionally administered libraries."

2. The teaching force

The costliest part of education is the teacher, and that in spite of the fact that he is among the poorest paid of professional men. As recently as fifteen years ago a professor in a college doing creditable work not infrequently taught as many as thirty semester hours. Now the maximum is fixed at sixteen hours. On the theory of one hour for preparation, one hour in class, and one hour for correcting papers the professor has a forty-eight hour week, not including the large amount of time spent in faculty meetings, committee work, and conferences with students. Formerly a professor might hold two or three loosely connected chairs as history, Greek, and Bible. Now specialization is required as a condition of accrediting. The ratio of teachers to students once gave little concern. Now one teacher to ten or twelve students is considered necessary.

3. A teacher's minimum needs

Certain needs of the teacher himself have come to be more clearly recognized. He must frequently attend summer school to renew and enlarge his knowledge of facts and methods. He ought to have leave of absence at least one year in seven for study and travel to accumulate resources for the coming years. Otherwise his professional usefulness is almost certain to decrease. "At the moment when wealth of knowledge is wanted it cannot be acquired."¹ He should attend teachers' conferences and educational associations for the sake of kindling contact with the best minds in the educational world. All the time he should live, dress, and maintain his family on a scale consistent with his rank as a professional man, equal in training and service to the physician and lawyer. Further, he faces the probability of somewhat early retirement and therefore should be able to make provision for old age.

It is true that few teachers have been able to do all these things. But the expectation rapidly grows and soon will become a demand that they shall be able to do them, not primarily for their own sake but for the sake of their students. Unless teachers are vital, amply informed, and devoted to their work, they cannot invigorate life through knowledge. For this reason the time is near when only the schools that provide suitably for their teachers will be classed as standard or worthy of recognition.

4. Pension provision

Methodism then must make ready to raise more money for education. Mr. John D. Rockefeller's famous Christmas gift of $50,000,000 for the relief of teachers was an impressive lesson. It recognized a desperate need. It suggested the only efficient remedy. The money was distributed with rare judgment, a gift usually carrying the condition that three or four times as much be added to the fund for teachers' salaries. But the relief was only partial and it was confined to a limited number. What this rare benefaction initiated the church should now complete for the teachers in its schools. Temporary relief must pass over into just and permanent provision for a suitable standard of living. Otherwise the church can expect to retain only a weak and dispirited corps of teachers. It were better not to have schools unless they can be manned by teachers of vigor, scholarship, and high inspiration.

There is no doubt that if our schools meet the demands upon them and do their share in American education their capacity will need almost to be doubled and their expenditures more than doubled during the next ten years.

2. CONCLUSION

Necessary limitations.—The church has established and has in operation a large group of schools involving a heavy expense. Due to certain present conditions, increasing costs, rapid growth of student bodies, the introduction of new departments of teaching, our colleges are finding unusual difficulty in meeting their necessary current expenses.

Varsity crew, Syracuse University, Syracuse, N. Y.

The situation amounts to what is almost a crisis. These present needs are likely to continue to be during three years, the most insistent needs of the colleges.

There are other needs almost as pressing, such as additional material equipment, buildings, libraries, laboratories. No attempt has been made to set forth these needs in detail for the total cost would go beyond the provision of general benevolences. It seems to the Board of Education inescapable that many needs of the colleges must be provided for entirely beyond and outside of the public collection in the churches. This is what has been done in the past.

To make a scientific showing of even the present needs of the colleges in all their relations would involve investigations so expensive that the board would have felt embarrassed by the cost.

A primary interest.—Education is not a final end, but a primary interest; that is, education does not exist for itself as an end, but as a preparation for other undertakings. Those who would prove its claim to assistance from the church, must show that education returns more than all it costs, in service rendered in the accomplishment of all the great ends for which the church is striving. Is it not true that all our agencies and undertakings, whether they be the pastorate or the episcopacy, whether they be missions or philanthropies, depend for their guidance, their administration, their leadership, on men who a few years ago were making ready in college halls? What is asked of education is not simply the addition of graces and ornaments, what is asked is the promise of effective public and world service in all the causes for which the church does strive.

A balanced program needed.—Wise administration of our benevolences ought to provide for the largest immediate achievements in our various fields of activity on the front line, as it were. But it will be sorry service to mankind that prevents the laying of foundations for the greater missions and philanthropies of the next generation. The foundations must be laid down in our colleges and the doing will not wait. To find a proper balance between the needs of the service of the church in the present day and its underlying service in the schools and colleges in its work of education which is to blossom and bear fruit as the greater service tomorrow, to find this balance is a task of highest consequence to the future of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

I. THE BOARD OF SUNDAY SCHOOLS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

The Church by action of the General Conference established the Board of Sunday Schools "for the moral and religious instruction of our children and for the promotion of Bible knowledge among all our people." To this board is assigned "general oversight of all the Sunday-school interests of the Methodist Episcopal Church."¹

The constitution of this board specifies certain duties, such as the following:

1. Founding new Sunday schools in needy neighborhoods.
2. Contributing help to Sunday schools needing assistance.
3. Educating the church in all phases of Sunday-school work, constantly endeavoring to raise ideals and improve methods.
4. Determining the Sunday-school curriculum, including the courses for teacher training.
5. Giving impulse and direction to the study of the Bible in the church.

The General Conference has interpreted the task of the Board of Sunday Schools as including the promotion of men's church organizations, family worship, and various supplemental forms of religious education, such as week-day schools of religious education, daily vacation church schools, and a definite responsibility for recreational leadership. Upon these main lines, and in harmony with the definite tasks assigned, the Board of Sunday Schools has endeavored to carry out the will of the church since its organization in May, 1908.

II. FOURTEEN YEARS OF BOARD SUPERVISION

The annual reports of the board rendered to the church in complete detail and recorded in the year books give a compre-

Sunday-school total enrolment and average attendance 1908-1921

hensive account of the growth of the religious education movement in the Methodist Episcopal Church during the fourteen years of the board's history.¹

III. BASIS OF STUDIES AND SCOPE OF FACTS

A cross-section study.—In making this study of the present status of religious education in the Methodist Episcopal Church there were selected cross sections of the church in the United States, comprising twenty-four annual conferences and one district.

Three thousand churches studied.—One hundred and five districts of these conferences were studied. Written data were secured from more than three thousand separate churches covering the following subjects: Organization and administration of the church school; methods of increasing enrolment and attendance; leadership training; evangelistic results and life service volunteers; missionary education; methods of finance in local schools; recreational provisions; directors of religious education; week-day schools of religion, and vacation church schools.

Accurate information available.—In addition to this investigation the board had access to the findings of the Indiana Survey initiated by the Interchurch World Movement and completed by the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys; the reports of the Religious Education Association; the Sunday School Council of Evangelical Denominations; and also much accurate information within its own office. In addition to the published reports from the workers in the foreign field, first-hand information concerning the status of religious education in the foreign mission fields was obtained through the personal visitation of the Superintendent of the Foreign Department, to mission fields in South America, Europe, India, Malaysia, the Philippines, and the Far East, and through the experience of the Superintendent of Young People's Work, who conducted a series of religious education conferences in Japan, Korea, and China for the World's Sunday School Association. Limitation of space prevents more than a summary of the significant facts thus assembled concerning the teaching task of the church.

IV. THE TASK AS IT APPEARS TODAY

1. METHODIST EPISCOPAL RESPONSIBILITY

One fourth, our share.—These studies show that one-fourth of the Protestant responsibility for religious education in the United States belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church. Of the 19,000,000 persons enrolled in the Protestant Sunday schools, 4,278,616 are enrolled in the Sunday schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. Of the 27,000,000 persons of school age not enrolled in any church school, 6,500,000 form an equitable responsibility for our church. To meet this opportunity we must continue to overcome the habitual absence from the church school of a large percentage of the enrolment. We must also increase our present enrolment by more than one hundred per cent.

2. TRAINING AN ADEQUATE LEADERSHIP

Lack of trained leadership.—If we had our full constituency of American children and youth enrolled in our church schools, would we have an adequate force of trained teachers to instruct them? The survey shows that only seventeen per cent of the officers and teachers of our Sunday schools in the twenty-four conferences reporting have ever had any kind of teacher training. Less than five per cent of the present teaching force is now enrolled in any kind of training course; less than six per cent of the 43,627 young people, in the schools reporting, between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four is enrolled in any kind of training class which looks forward to a trained usefulness in the local church. The Indiana Survey shows that while the public schools recruit their teachers from middle and later adolescents, the church schools recruit teachers from the older children and adults, neglecting young men and women at the very time they are making life choices, and should be in training for service.

The teacher-training task

It is very significant that the schools reporting teacher-training activity beyond the average, also show a larger percentage of attendance than the average, and a larger percentage of accessions to the church from the Sunday-school membership.

There is unquestionably improvement in all phases of Sunday-school work in proportion as officers and teachers are being definitely trained.

a. Field work and organization.—Where the board has full time field men stimulating and promoting Sunday-school efficiency, and where its institutes and schools of methods have been held, the reports show a twelve per cent gain in the number of teachers taking training as over

Sunday-school teachers enrolled in training classes by the Board of Sunday Schools since its organization the conferences where these forms of field work have not obtained. Twenty-nine per cent have organized departments, as against twenty-one per cent where there are no extension men. Forty-four per cent have graded lessons, as against thirty-six per cent where there are no extension men. The year 1921 was the banner year in teacher-training activity in our church, but the year 1922 exceeds it in the number of teacher-training classes, of students enrolled, and of standard diplomas and certificates given for class work.

Since the success of the movement for religious education in the church depends so largely upon a greatly increased force of qualified officers and teachers, the Board of Sunday Schools feels that it must promptly expand its present force of seventeen intensive field workers, confined now to twenty conferences, until it shall have at least one full-time, thoroughly capable man in each annual conference, backed by a Conference Board of Religious Education.¹

b. Institutes and schools.—Campus summer schools are provided for those who are training for work in the local church, and especially for those who will give themselves to leadership as field directors of religious education.

The Conference training schools, for a shorter time and with fewer courses, bring together general and local workers from the annual conference field for special training.

District institutes of still shorter duration give inspiration and specific information to Sunday-school workers, though no credits are offered toward certificates or diplomas.

Church training night, one of the most promising features in the local church today, in which the local church has correlated all its training activities, affords a fine opportunity to add to the regular teacher-training classes a weekly seminar on the problems of the church school.

The number of all these types of training schools should be increased until all teachers and prospective teachers, in either the Sunday or week-day sessions of the church school, shall find it possible to take special practical courses of training.

c. Directors of religious education.—By the legislation of the General Conference of 1920 provision was made for the appointment by the Quarterly Conference of a director of religious education, to have general supervision of the entire teaching program of the church. Already this important position is being filled in a number of forward-looking churches. The studies show that of the 2,684 churches reporting, 569, or twenty per cent, have a director of religious education. It appears, however, that only 46 of these are paid directors. Even the designation of volunteer directors indicates a recognition of the need and opportunity for special leadership in unifying the teaching and training programs of the local church. The regular organization of our church by districts and groups invites most naturally the appointment of directors for the stimulation and supervision of religious education within these units.

Relation of Sunday-school evangelism to net increase in church membership 1908-1921

3. EVANGELISM IN THE CHURCH SCHOOL

Accessions from the Sunday schools.—The growth of church membership depends very largely upon evangelistic success in the Sunday school. From 1908 to 1921, 2,249,436 members of the Sunday schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church were received into church membership. During the same fourteen years the net gain in church membership (full members) was 1,067,793, or less than half the number of accessions from the Sunday schools alone.

The report for the single year 1921 shows the same ratio: accessions from the Sunday schools, 200,668; net gain in church membership (full members), 78,682.

Evangelism must be understood as continuous. The initial act of confessing Christ and uniting with the church is not the end of evangelism, but the basis for a continuous process of growth in grace through Christian nurture, instruction, and training in service.

Religious education and evangelism.—The relation of religious education to evangelism is most admirably stated in a paper adopted by the Religious Education

Council of Canada, from which the following is quoted:

"We seek to enlarge the content of the term evangelism so that evangelizing shall be understood to mean Christianizing, not limiting the term to a single emotional crisis in the life or to the joining of the church, but including in it antecedent and subsequent educational processes.

"We seek, on the other hand, to enlarge the content of the term education so that it shall not be regarded as a mere process of formal instruction, but rather as a vital process promotive of religious life, and including in its objectives decision for Christ, church membership, Christian intelligence, and social efficiency."

4. STATUS OF CHILDREN IN THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

A huge, unfinished task.—On the basis of the survey of twenty-four conferences, there are Cradle Rolls in 73 per cent of the Sunday schools. This means that in 27 per cent of the Sunday schools no provision is made by the church for the religious training of children under four years of age. In 64 per cent of the churches reporting, the Sunday school is the only church organization of any kind operating for the religious training of the children under twelve years of age.

The degree of graded organization is gratifying, but the figures show that there is still work to be done. Thirty-three per cent of the Beginners' Departments, thirty-six per cent of the Primary Departments, and thirty-two per cent of the Junior Departments are organized; while twenty-one per cent of the churches reporting admit that even their youngest children meet in the same room with the adults, join in the same worship, and study the same lessons.

The circle talk in the Beginners' department

On the basis of the survey, forty-eight per cent of the pupils enrolled in our Sunday schools are under twelve years of age. This includes the Cradle Roll Department.

5. DISTINCTIVE MISSION TO YOUNG PEOPLE

The young people's department. — The survey reveals that the age group from twelve to twenty-four years represents thirty-three per cent of the entire Sunday-school enrolment. Thirty-two per cent of the churches studied had no other organized agency for this age group than the Sunday school. The Indiana Survey shows that forty-six per cent of the churches studied had no other organization for the children and young people than the Sunday school.

In view of this large responsibility for the most critical period of life, it is pertinent to ask what the Board of Sunday Schools has to offer pastors, Sunday-school officers and teachers, and parents, all of whom are involved, in meeting the needs and developing the Christian character of youth. The board's program urges:

1. An organization by departments and by classes in which the intermediates, seniors, and young people may be served according to their special needs.

2. This organization, with its program of worship, instruction, expression, and service recognizes the tested principle that young people are best developed by being helped to develop themselves. Provision, therefore, is made for participation in the planning and the conduct of the entire program of the church school by the young people.

Scouting builds good men

3. The other well-known but frequently ignored fact which governs standards for work with young people is the indivisible unity of life. To serve any phase of life effectively we must give consideration to the total interest. This calls for the varied program recommended.

Recreational needs. — What is the recreational need in this field? Of the 2,249 churches reporting on recreational and social provision,

19%	have playrooms,
12%	have playgrounds,
5%	have gymnasiums,
5%	have athletic fields.

With so few of our churches making any adequate provision for the recreational activities of our children and young people, is it any wonder that so many of them seek their satisfaction in this respect with non-church and generally with non-religious agencies? Finding most of their exhilaration far from the church, vast numbers of them do not return to the church for their religious satisfaction. The church must minister to the whole life.

The Bureau of Architecture reports that eighty per cent of the new church buildings seeking the counsel of the bureau last year are providing recreational equipment.

The modern church must recognize the importance of recreational facilities for the cultivation of those social ideas and principles which will guide our young people in the normal social relationships of the community.

Influence of outside agencies. — Forty-seven per cent of the recreational programs reported are under the auspices of outside agencies. The Indiana Survey shows that nine out of ten Boy Scouts are members of the Sunday school, but the local churches usually have only a remote relation to the local councils of this movement.

The older boys' and older girls' conferences are being offered as effective means for cultivating the interest of young people in Christian leadership, and yet over half of the churches reporting that they had sent boys to such conferences indicated that they were not conferences under church auspices. Excellent as the influence of these extra-church and allied agencies may be, a church that continues to farm out its youth for training will continue to be in dire need of strong recruits for its leadership.

Life service recruits.—From the 1,509 churches answering the question, 1,320 young people entered full-time Christian service during the ten years from 1912 to 1921—an average of not quite one from each church in the decade.

406 chose the ministry,
253 foreign missions,
76 home missions,
124 deaconess work,
127 work as pastor's assistant,
54 directorship of religious education,
101 Y. M. C. A. work,
42 Y. W. C. A. work, and 137 other fields.

One thousand one hundred sixty-three churches report a total of 959 young people now in training for full-time Christian service, or three-fourths as many as were reported entering full-time Christian service during the previous ten years, and yet this is an utterly inadequate gain in this field.

6. TRAINING WORLD CHRISTIANS

Spiritual aims.—Although the review of missionary education in the Sunday schools, as conducted by this board, has revealed phenomenally increased offerings to the benevolences by the members of the Sunday schools, still this financial evidence is not the conscious objective of missionary education. All sorts of influences have wrought together to do away with geographical provincialism. The intermingling of the races by travel, by quick communication and for commercial purposes has made it more insistent that the provincial mind shall give way to a mind of world sympathy and a spirit of world brotherhood. In achieving this distinctly spiritual aim our efforts are already producing notable results.

Capable leadership.—One of the methods of organization

Missionary offerings in Methodist Episcopal Sunday schools since the organization of the Board of Sunday Schools. Per annum averages for quadrenniums stimulated by the Department of Missionary Education is to have a capable missionary superintendent in every Sunday school.¹ Under the leadership of this officer missionary programs and expressional service-activities are constantly promoted. Over 20,210 Sunday schools have provided missionary superintendents. The studies of 1,105 schools in three representative conferences, the Kansas, Wilmington and New England, showed that:

7. THIS BOARD'S SERVICE TO ADULTS

Organized lay forces.—Since the entire program of the church for childhood and youth is almost entirely dependent upon the good will and wisdom of adults, the board has an urgent mission to the grown-ups in the church school. The organized Adult Bible Class movement is today the largest and most widely distributed organization of the lay forces of the church.

Three thousand churches replying to the inquiry reported an enrolment of 119,420 persons over 24 years of age. These same schools reported a total enrolment of 627,182. It will be seen that nineteen per cent are adults, nearly one-fifth of the entire enrolment.

a. Many of them are parents.—The family, therefore, must be exalted in their thinking and doing. The board is promoting a revival of worship and religious instruction in the home. As parents these adults may help or hinder greatly the efforts of the teachers of their children. The board promotes mothers' associations and parents' classes. It endeavors to establish a more effective co-operation between the home and the church in their common task for childhood and youth.

b. These adults are citizens, voters; their intelligent Christian convictions respecting a social order that shall be Christian is of the utmost importance. The Bible classes are in many instances forums for the study of applied Christianity.

c. These adults are laymen of the church.—What they think, and how they feel toward the policy and objectives of the church is a matter of great concern. The board aims to help the local churches in their efforts to have a laity, broad in its vision, sympathies, and fervent in its passion for righteousness.

The Adult Bible Class has proved to be a most effective evangelistic agency in winning men and women to Christ, and in relating them to active membership in the church.

8. WEEK-DAY AND VACATION CHURCH SCHOOLS

A timely challenge.—The church school is now clearly recognized as operating on Sunday, week days, during the school year, and during vacation.

The Sunday session of the church school is now and probably will be for some time the strongest arm of the church in its religious educational activity. The week-day church school, meeting before, after, but preferably during school hours, and the daily vacation church school carried on during the summer vacation for periods of three to five or even eight weeks, are supplemental agencies.

Practically the entire public school world is alive to the challenge of undergirding the coming generation with the fundamental principles of a Christian citizenship.

The vast numbers of children in the United States as yet untouched by any form of education in religion is appalling.

Practically one-half of our total population is under twenty-five years of age, and three-fifths of these have no religious education.

In Jewish religious schools.....	87,000 ³
Unreached Protestants	27,274,000

These figures seem to justify Professor Athearn's statement:

"The democratic state has created, in the public school system, a piece of machinery which can be depended upon to hand on, from generation to generation, social and industrial achievements of the race; but we have not had an equally efficient piece of machinery with which to hand on from generation to generation the moral and spiritual achievements of the race."

A church school system.—The Christian church is now in the process of organizing a church school system that will reach the very last child. This system will have its Sunday, week-day, and vacation school sessions.

The increase in population of the United States averages 1.4 per cent annually. The annual increase in the enrolment of children in our Sunday schools is approximately three-tenths per cent.

Our own church was early in the field experimenting to find a way to check this tragic decline. Through the work of this board in this field certain guide lines have been set, certain conclusions reached and definite leadership established. Its embarrassment is the rapidity with which the movement is spreading and the nature and frequency of the calls for help.

Approximately 800 week-day schools are reported in the office of the Religious Education Association. Twenty-four Methodist Episcopal conferences report 358. In these are enrolled one per cent of the

A class in daily vacation Bible school

Waiting for the daily vacation Bible school to open

Protestant school population of the communities involved. Three hundred and thirty-one of these schools meet in Methodist Episcopal churches.

A community school.—The movement, however, is co-operative. Several or all of the churches of a community unite to reach all the children. Methodism's opportunity is, first, to see that each of the 29,620 Methodist Episcopal churches makes larger time provision for the 3,500,000 school children already enrolled as Sunday-school pupils, and for her share of the 27,000,000 children not related to any Sunday school or church. She must also see to it that the 462 district superintendents and the 16,554 pastors as well as other leaders are provided with necessary information and help.

The church must provide through colleges and theological schools, trained leaders, both lay and clerical, men and women who will head the schools and teach the children. Whole communities have already turned to this method of religious instruction.

As an Americanizing influence and a missionary enterprise, the weekday church school is of outstanding value. If the 5,522 pupils reported in 331 Methodist schools who had no church home are won to the Sunday school, and their parents to the church, the effort will be most worth while.

Vacation schools.—Otherwise idle churches, idle college students, idle boys and girls are utilized by vacation church schools. In 1922 more than 5,000 such schools were held, with an enrolment of over 350,000 children. Of these forty per cent were boys and girls untouched by any church or Sunday school.

In twenty-four conferences 228 vacation church schools were held in 1922, enrolling 27,830 pupils. This is 9.5 per cent of the 2,383 churches replying to this item in the questionnaire. There were reported 338 as held in co-operation with other church or churches of the community. Of the pupils enrolled in these schools 5,522 were not connected with any Sunday school or church.

A missionary harvest field.—As a missionary enterprise, especially in non-churched and congested foreign-speaking communities, the daily vacation church school is unsurpassed. Also its rapid introduction in foreign lands is providing a means by which the increasing numbers of Christian college men and women may carry the Message to the childhood and youth of their own home communities.

In active promotion, number of vacation schools, and interest, Methodism stands third in America. The Presbyterians with 878 schools in 1922, and the Baptists with 641 surpass us.

The program, the methods, and worthy curricula, are ready for churches and communities. Co-operation with the International Association of Daily Vacation Bible Schools is established. The field is ready. Leadership is available.

The training of the teachers for the vacation schools is a problem to be met only by adequate college courses and by community and denominational training schools. There were six such schools held by Methodists in 1922, 29 by Presbyterians and 26 by Baptists.

Feeding German children— a result of the Sunday-school Christmas offering

No greater challenge may be found in the entire church than the opportunity for week-day religious education as it presents itself today.

9. THE CHALLENGE OF THE FOREIGN FIELD

Needs and plans in foreign fields.— Making allowance for differences of method due to differences of racial characteristics, religious backgrounds and experience, historical and local conditions, all that has been said thus far connotes like needs and plans for religious education in lands outside America, for there we are carrying on this same great task.

Prior to 1908, the type of Sunday-school work done on the foreign field was variable. If a given missionary happened to be interested in it, it prospered in his station to the extent of his understanding and until he became submerged beneath the numerous duties of the mission field. Everything depended upon the missionaries and they have always been overloaded with a multiplicity of inescapable duties.

In 1908, however, the church reorganized its religious educational work through the Sunday schools at home and abroad and through its Board of Sunday Schools began to give intensive cultivation to the work in foreign fields. The general plan has been to place a specialist, trained in religious education, in each general racial, or linguistic, or national field, and then build up about this secretary a staff of skilled associates to aid in the creation of literature, in the training of teachers and other leaders, in holding institutes, and in aiding the missionaries and national workers to a fuller and more accurate understanding of their task.

The limited funds available for this work have made it impossible thus far to more than make a beginning upon this program putting a secretary only into a given field, occasionally with an assistant, and initiating efforts toward the creation of lessons and helps, teacher training, and the establishing of standards of work. Even this skeleton outline organization has not yet been completed in all our mission fields, but our Board of Sunday Schools has now thirty-five such workers in the different countries of the foreign world. These workers are mostly nationals, for it is the policy of the board to use national leadership wherever possible.

Significant results. — Already it is possible to see results from this policy, as a few comparisons will indicate.

1. In India the board did not put an American secretary at work until 1916. In the five years since then the number of Sunday schools has increased almost 2,000 and the membership has jumped from 134,042 to 187,126.

2. In Europe, the general director of this work was not installed until 1919, but in the following two years our Sunday-school membership has increased 20,000 in spite of all the confusion and disruption of after-war times.

3. In the Philippines in 1912 our Sunday-school membership was 8,685; in 1921 it had increased to 31,373, under the leadership of a secretary trained in the Department of Religious Education of Northwestern University.

The work of specialists. — A comparison between the increase in church membership and that in Sunday-school membership shows the effect of intensive specialized leadership.

Most of the larger of these Sunday-school increases have come in the last four years, so that the results have scarcely had time to register heavily in the church membership increase which must inevitably follow later, especially if funds become available to permit the quality of the work to keep pace with the quantity expansion.

One further comparison is illuminating. The following denominations doing Sunday-school work in the Philippines have no Sunday-school specialist in that field: Presbyte-

Methodist and other Protestant Sunday-school enrolment in the Philippine Islands rian, Disciples, United Brethren, Congregational and Baptist. Their total combined Sunday-school membership in the Philippines amounts to 32,127. The membership of Methodist Episcopal Sunday schools is 31,370. Methodism with a specialist directing its work both qualitatively and quantitatively in the field comes within 757 of having as many

V. WHAT THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SHOULD DO FOR RELIGIOUS EDUCATION IN THE NEXT TEN YEARS

The church's future emphasis.—Bearing in mind the main achievements in this field during the recent past and the rather careful study of the present situation, the prophets of religious education generally agree upon these lines of development:

1. THE EDUCATIONAL POINT OF VIEW

The church as a whole must be led to accept the educational point of view that religion can be taught and must be fully committed to the teaching method as a major concern in establishing the rule of Christ throughout the world. The church of today must yet be convinced that a Christian life for the individual and for society is an achievement; that we must prepare for Christian decision by Christian nurture and follow such decision by instruction and training. The Board of Sunday Schools believes that leading our church to this conception is its biggest task in the next ten years.

2. WHAT THIS POINT OF VIEW IMPLIES

When the church is fully committed to a program of religious instruction certain obvious provisions must follow.

a. Buildings and equipment. — A re-adjustment of buildings and equipment to make possible the work of the school of the church.

b. Time for the church school.—Provision for an extension of the time for instruction and training far beyond the limited period now available for the Sunday session of the church school. The teaching program of the local church properly correlated will afford more time. The home should make its contribution of time needed and the public schools should make possible better week-day schools of religious education by co-operating with the church in arranging the necessary time schedules.

c. A trained leadership. — The most vital provision is in the field of a trained leadership for the local church. There must be officials with vision, courage and skill to organize and administer the church for teaching purposes, a teaching force which even though it must be volunteer for the most part, will have such intelligent understanding of the spiritual worth of the enterprise as to give both devotion and ability to the work.

No such trained leadership can possibly be furnished the local churches of Methodism without a large expansion of the present field organization and of schools for the training and inspiring of such a body of workers. In the entire range of a trained personnel for the realization of a church should be able to offer local churches and training schools as well as to the departments of religious education in colleges and seminaries, curricula in the field of religion better articulated and truer to the best educational principles than obtain in other fields of education.

e. Necessary correlation.

—The problem of correlation among all the agencies interested in the common task of religious teaching program, the next ten years should witness at least a ten-fold advance.

d. An adequate curriculum.—The teaching material must be put into the best possible form for teaching purposes. We have only begun on this problem of providing a curriculum of religious material for use in the various sessions of the church school. During the next ten years our

—is better than—

—court cure." Judge Ben B. Lindsey education must be advanced toward solution as rapidly as possible. The home, the school and the church must find a way to closer affiliation. The present promiscuous efforts of the various agencies in the local churches must give way to a correlated and purposeful plan of procedure. This will require a frank understanding and agreement on the part of the connectional agencies which cultivate the local church. It also involves the question as to the degree of co-operation we may enter upon with other denominations and agencies.

f. Tested results. — We must develop a practical method by which all that enters into the outfit for religious education shall be tested constantly in terms of the output of intelligent loyal Christian character.

g. Local financial provision. — Finally all the above means that local churches must put into their budgets greatly increased amounts for religious education. We note from the Indiana Survey that out of every municipal dollar, 47 cents are spent for public school purposes, while out of every church dollar only 2.3 cents are used for the church school.

3. MODERN FAMILY LIFE

Many discriminating students of this movement of religious education believe that the modern family is the most important field for cultivation. The responses to efforts in that field since the General Conference definitely assigned the task to this board fully justifies this judgment. Before the next decade shall have passed, the church school throughout the denomination should have parents' organizations working so effectively that systematic religious instruction will be observed in all our church families.

But behind and beyond this, family life itself is at stake. Economic pressure, the demand for individual freedom, the lure of careers for women, the growth of apartment hotels, lax social relationships, and the breakdown of social responsibility for home-making and children—all are tending to disrupt the home as a fundamental social unit. How to withstand these tendencies in modern life and to substitute for them an enthusiastic acceptance and support of the Christian home is a problem which the Board of Sunday Schools has got to face, in behalf of the childhood of the world.

We believe that these are some of the main lines on which the movement of religious education in our church will advance during the coming years and that the Board of Sunday Schools must give itself more vigorously to these tasks.

4. ADVANCE AND EXPANSION IN FIELD WORK

a. Field cultivation.

—The number of well-qualified men who are to promote the total program of religious education in the field must be increased. The board now has seventeen such men covering the territory of twenty annual conferences. Fifteen definite and insistent appeals are now filed with the board from as many conferences. In view of this widespread interest, the board hopes to provide for an addition of an average of ten well-trained leaders each year for the next decade, so that by 1934 each annual conference in America will be served by a director of the teaching program of the church schools. Such a field director of religious education would happily bridge the gap between the Board of Sunday Schools and the local Sunday schools.

Along with this supply of specially trained leaders must go the continued organization of the conference boards of religious education, with a view to securing their initiative, increasing financial co-operation, and backing for the field program of the board.

b. Expansion in foreign fields.—

We cannot permit ourselves to plan more largely

A study in Sunday-school extension. Relation of costs to resources in 1915 and 1922 for our own favored land than we must for the children and young people of our neighbor nations. Happily the board faces the new decade with its picket line placed in all the great mission fields. There were three representatives in the foreign field, (Germany, Italy, and Sweden), in 1912; there are thirty-five in 1922, supervising the work in all Europe, in the Philippines, India, China, Korea, Japan, and South America.

Based upon the expansion of the past ten years, and upon the open doors of opportunity now appealing, the normal expansion for the next decade would call for an increase of nine American field secretaries, 138 national workers, and provision for teaching material written in the language of the various peoples and born of their type of thought.

The program which the Board of Sunday Schools proposes for foreign fields is the result of a careful survey of these fields by the board's representatives now working there, plus consultation between its foreign superintendents and bishops and missionaries in most of the fields, and a mass of data upon the subject of religious education in these fields now on file in the board's office. The program is broad, comprehensive, sound.

The foreign field program.—Involving on the one hand the creation of lesson-supplies, story-paper materials, materials for teacher-training, instructional literature for departmental and graded work, and on the other, the conducting of institutes, summer schools of religious education, daily vacation Bible schools and week-day schools of religious instruction where local conditions make these desirable, this program is in harmony with the best principles of religious education. Moreover it is to be carried out not only with reference to the requirements of an indigenous development, but also in fullest co-operation with whatever work of a similar nature is being done in given fields by our own or other denominations.

Members of a frontier Sunday school that meets once every three weeks—Stimulated by the Extension Department representative

This complete and important program is to be carried out, not in one field alone, but in every country in which our church operates, around the world. The expanding force of trained specialists necessary to create the above-mentioned literature, conduct the institutes and other training work, and aid in directing the trained leadership that the church must have if she is to win these lands to Christ, will, it is estimated, ultimately reach 140.

An immediate requirement.—The Board of Sunday Schools plans to complete this secretarial organization in the immediately ensuing years, build up the staffs in these fields to the minimum of necessary requirements, create the needed literature, either by itself or in co-operation with others where this latter can be done consistently with a right quality of work, and aggressively develop religious education in accordance with the genius of the peoples among whom we work. This will inevitably mean, also, that while America will aid in the finances and in placing the rich results of her fifty years of experimentation in Sunday-school work at the disposal of these different peoples, her main aid will come through the training up of well equipped indigenous leaders who will at the earliest possible date assume full control and carry the work on in terms and forms that they know will best meet the field's need.

The literature will have to be created for each country or racial or linguistic group, as the case may be. It will not do simply to translate good graded materials from America. The whole range of literary forms, literary allusions, and even historical characters that are native to us as Anglo-Saxons, is quite foreign to the Latins, the Slavs, the Orientals, and the others. We must find or train up leaders, with Anglo-Saxon assistance for the present, who will create an increasingly indigenous literature. And it will cost money to print as well as to create this literature. But the money must be forthcoming if our church is to take her religious-educational task seriously in foreign fields.

Grants in aid.—Further, in the sterile portions of South America, in many of the islands, in three-fourths of India and in many sections of China, the people who wait for help are so poor that they cannot purchase the supplies for their Sunday schools when produced. They can and do pay a little; but their poverty is so beyond the imagination of North America that it cannot be described. Literature grants are at present keeping open scores of schools in all the foreign fields which but for such help would have to close. Eventually they will become strong; but today they must be carried. Such grants are not optional; they are imperative if we wish the work inaugurated to live.

A world-wide responsibility.—We are only beginning as a denomination to realize how our church has been but toying with its supreme obligation to undergird its total evangelism with the evangelism of religious education. In her comprehensive program of a world ministry of religious education, the church for the first time seriously faces her total task. It will cost money, as any worth-while task on a world-scale inevitably must. Than this our church has no more fundamental duty.

Christian stewards in training—The missionary offering in the Primary department and the obligations of church membership should be embodied in the material used in teaching the children and young people in the Sunday school.

6. EXPANSION OF MISSIONARY EDUCATION

Missions at the center.—Missionary education in the Sunday school proceeds upon the principle that practically all teaching of religion by the project method creates missionary habits of thinking, missionary habits of feeling, and missionary habits of doing. For whenever you lead a pupil to put Christianity to work in his sector of the social order, you are at once in the field of Christian service. And that is the field of missionary education.

So far, missionary education in our Sunday schools has been largely confined to the raising of a huge sum of money, and to undergirding that financial appeal with the necessary information, generally by some form of the monthly missionary program.

c. Additional summer schools.—We must establish more campus schools at strategic points, until we have them available for the choice young people throughout the church who are willing to qualify for large leadership. There are now six such schools. Ten more of these are needed.

The conference schools should keep pace with the expansion of the field men and conference board organizations.

5. CURRICULUM PROMOTION

Complete teaching material.—The closely graded system of lessons, now so widely used in our Sunday schools, must be supplemented by introducing whatever material is found to be necessary for a fuller education of the church-school pupils in intelligent Christian living.

The principles and methods of Christian stewardship, the Christian duties of citizenship

Schools of Sunday-school methods, 1922

But in the next decade most vigorous steps should be taken to put missions at the heart of all religious education done by the church schools, and to provide training in and commitment to the principles of Christian stewardship. Only thus can Methodism's world service program be undergirded for the future.

A missionary dramatization, "Chundra Lelah," by pupils in a week-day school of religion

7. WEEK-DAY VACATION SCHOOLS

Extension of week-day schools.—The next decade will probably see the extension of the week-day and vacation church school movement throughout Christendom. The provision of adequate curricula and standards of organization and administration are an outstanding obligation. It is necessary that the publicity and promotional activities shall steady the movement lest it become a superficial activity rather than a substantial advance. Materials and methods must be standardized, teachers and leaders trained and the whole movement must be kept on a worthy plane in order that the co-operation of the public schools may be justified and unembarrassed. It is essential that the church shall be kept intimately acquainted with the facts as the movement grows, that its direction may be along desirable lines.

8. DEVELOPMENT OF THE LOCAL SCHOOL

a. Church-school buildings.—The interest of the Board of Sunday Schools in architecture is primarily educational. Pastors and building committees contemplating new buildings or improvements on old buildings will desire the educational reasons for the type of buildings urged for their approval. They will quickly see the advantage, not to say the necessity of a church building that shall make provision for a teaching program and for the social and recreational features of such a program of education. We are unquestionably entering upon the greatest decade of church building at home and abroad that the church has ever known, and the Board of Sunday Schools must see to it that the entire church appreciates both the artistic and educational elements in church building plans.

b. The graded Sunday school.—The survey shows that graded organization for teaching purposes has brought increased results in all phases of Sunday-school work. The average attendance in such schools and the number of accessions to the church are far above the average. The Indiana Survey shows that 70 per cent of the schools studied have made no successful attempt to grade their organization. Here is a field for marked advance during the next decade.

The touch and go method will not effect the result. We must have workers who will stay by a situation until the new order is established. This will call for an increase of special workers to meet the calls for help in this particular.

9. DIRECTORS OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION

A need in the local school.—All we propose in the way of field expansion and training schools serves to accentuate the need of the local church for a highly trained director of religious education.

One of the findings of the Indiana Survey is expressed as follows: "The local Sunday schools of Indiana are suffering from the effects of long distance supervision, and from their failure to recognize that voluntary local workers need immediate contact and personal supervision by highly trained specialists."

What is true of Indiana is true of the whole church.

In the years immediately before us local churches must be helped to see that next in importance to a qualified pastor and preacher is the director of the teaching activities of the whole church. Provision in local budgets must be made for such a full time worker. The demand from the local churches for such a form of life service must stimulate the colleges to provide adequate training for an increasing number of the choicest young people to meet the demand. The standing of such an office must be defined by the authority of the church.

A new field for higher education.—If the church is a teaching institution, it should have a worthy body of teaching material, a faculty or force of trained and supervised teachers, and a group of pupils organized and equipped for teaching purposes.

To this end, we appeal for adequate provision, in the colleges, universities, and theological schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church, for professors and for courses of study in order to train professional and volunteer leaders and teachers.

No more insistent opportunity has ever appealed to our educational institutions than this demand for a trained and forceful body of college graduates to put this popular movement of religious education above educational reproach and to furnish it with a curriculum of practical excellency.

WORKERS THE CHURCH MUST NOT FORGET

It seems to me that no higher duty rests upon the laymen in connection with their support of the church than that of helping to create a fund out of which we may guarantee to our ministers in their declining years peace and security for themselves and their families.

I. GENERAL STATEMENT

1. HISTORICAL

a. The situation prior to 1908.—Until 1908 there was no board or administrative officer responsible for the cause of conference claimants; the distribution was based solely on need; the amount of money available for distribution was small, viz.:

1870, $129,898.

1880, $130,944. Increase during the decade, $1,046.

1890, $137,093. Increase during the decade, $6,149.

1900, $260,402. Increase during the decade, $123,309.

1908, $606,000. Increase during eight years, $345,598.

1922, $2,586,396. Increase during seven years, $1,361,120.

The increase in 1908 resulted from agitation growing out of the appointment of the Commission in 1904, and the increase of the Book Concern dividends. Since that time the church has traveled fast along the new legislative highway, and will reach the goal of a three and a half million dollar annual distribution when once again the attention and interest of the church shall be devoted to this holy task.

b. An obligation of the entire church.—The motive back of the new legislation was the obligation of the entire church to assist in caring for the claimants of the poorer and weaker conferences. In their report the commissioners said: "The fact that none but the strong conferences can create funds cannot be overlooked. Some of the weaker conferences have small funds, but the increase has been so slow that it emphasizes the statement that this class of conferences can make but little provision for conference claimants by this form of relief. Hence the connectional fund.

"While the annual collection is a most constant and helpful source of income, it is plain that it cannot possibly meet the needs of the conference claimants in the small conferences, and it is equally plain that the increase from any permanent funds which they are able to create will be limited. These facts and conditions imperatively demand the creation of a connectional permanent fund."

Influenced by such considerations, the General Conference accepted connectional responsibility for the support of conference claimants and organized the Board of Conference Claimants to carry out its will. Deficits in the larger and stronger conferences will be provided for without denominational assistance, but the weaker conferences will never be able to provide adequately for their retired ministers without denominational help, and the board is the agent of the whole church to help them in old age and disability "according to need."

c. Objectives of the board.—Two tasks were given to the board:¹

1. "To build up and administer a connectional permanent fund, in order that a more equitable and general support might be secured for conference claimants, especially for those in the more needy conferences, by a distribution 'according to need.'"

2. "To increase revenues for the benefit of conference claimants."

2. PRESENT AND FUTURE NEEDS

a. The number of claimants.—In 1921, there were:

Retired Ministers	3,400
Widows	3,857
Dependent Orphans.....	861
Total	8,118

In 1921, the sum of $2,586,396 was paid to them. They constitute two-fifths of the pension beneficiaries of American Protestantism.

b. Necessitous cases.—The demands for necessitous cases will increase in the weaker conferences; for it is only by a larger necessitous distribution that the lack of equity between the pitifully small amounts paid by the poorer and weaker conferences and the liberal amounts paid by prosperous conferences can be corrected. The board requires not only a larger current income, but also a special endowment held in trust for the weaker conferences.

c. Present and future needs.—A careful study of the situation shows the need, immediately and constantly during the next decade, of increasing greatly the income for immediate distribution, and of large additions to the connectional permanent fund and to the endowments of the annual conferences.

II. THE EQUALIZATION FUND

1. REASONS FOR ITS CREATION

Serious difficulties in the administration of ministerial pensions because the conference by which a preacher is retired is held responsible for his entire service annuity, even though he had served only a few years in the conference, led to the investigation by the board and the presentation of its findings to the General Conference of 1920, which referred the suggestions to the Committee on Itinerancy. Its recommendations were referred to the Council of Boards of Benevolence with authority, and the equalization fund became the law of the church.

a. The need and the remedy.—When ministers who had served in several conferences became a liability on the conference which retired them there was an evident lack of equity, especially after the conferences began to pay high annuity rates; and some conferences set up barriers against the transfer of ministers who had any considerable length of service, or limited the distribution of the income of conference endowments and preachers' aid societies.

The income of the equalization fund, which is a part of the connectional apportionment for the Board of Conference Claimants, will be distributed among the several conferences "in proportion to their liability for the years of service of their retired ministers which have been rendered in conferences other than their own. It is the duty of the Board of Conference Claimants to determine the processes by which the legislation shall be put into operation, and the duty of the Council of Boards 'to add to the apportionment made for the support and maintenance of the Board of Conference Claimants an adequate amount for the equalization fund'."

b. The basis of calculation.—The new survey made by the board covers the records of service of all the retired ministers and, by a double entry system of accounting, shows exactly the obligations of the several conferences. Each annual conference is credited with the number of years its retired ministers have served outside its boundaries, for which it is paying an annuity, and is debited with the years served within its boundaries for which other conferences pay; the total years thus charged against a conference being the same as those credited to the conference which pays the annuity.

In setting up the equalization fund the obligations to the creditor conferences are made on the basis of the calculation at

The Knight of the Saddlebags lives over again, in memory, the days of battle

- I. The pre-war dollar.
 II. The dollar to-day—reduced 40 per cent in buying power.
 III. Section of reduced dollar representing 40 cents unpaid to conference claimants.

the rate actually paid. The total claims are figured on the basis of the net credit years, that is, the difference between the years of service rendered in other conferences for which the creditor conferences have paid, and the years of service rendered in the debtor conferences which were paid by the other conferences. The excess in the number of years paid for by the creditor conferences, multiplied by the annuity rate paid by them, gives the total credit in dollars. The total aggregate of such excess claims paid by the creditor conferences is the amount to be apportioned to the pastoral charges for the equalization fund. In this way the entire connection shares in the burdens and benefits, because the equalization fund both discharges the debts of the debtor conferences, and reimburses the creditor conferences for the excess payments made by them.

2. DISCIPLINARY PROVISIONS FOR THE EQUALIZATION FUND

"In order to equalize among the several annual conferences the claims for annuities paid by them for years of service rendered in other conferences than their own, there shall be created an equalization fund, the receipts from which shall be distributed among the several annual conferences in proportion to the liability for the years of service of their retired ministers which have been rendered in other conferences than their own. Such equalization fund shall become a part of the connectional apportionment for the Board of Conference Claimants and be distributed directly to the annual conference in proportion to their several liabilities for such years of service, provided that the rate paid to an annual conference shall not exceed the rate paid by such conference to its conference claimants.

The board shall determine the processes by which this legislation shall be put into operation and the Council of Boards of Benevolence shall add to the apportionment made for the support and maintenance of the board, the securing of endowments for annual conferences and the Board, and increasing its annual dividend to the poorer and weaker conferences, an adequate amount for the equalization fund."¹

3. TOTAL APPORTIONMENT

The tabulations, carefully prepared and worked out, and determined show that the total claims on the equalization fund for the retired ministers alone are $79,078.

The task, now under way, of examining the records of the 3,828 widows and 816 dependent orphans is one of great difficulty, and it is not practicable at this time

In the Advance Program, $20,000 has been allotted to the Equalization Fund.

III. SUPPORT OF AGED AND DISABLED SUPPLY PASTORS

1. CONNECTIONAL PROVISIONS

That financial recognition should be given to the old age or disability of faithful supply pastors is a natural reaction to the enlarged pension plans of Methodism. Their invaluable services, rendered often on meagre support and under difficult conditions, has resulted in a widespread conviction that they ought not to be neglected in old age.

a. Just recognition. — At first, the supply was a local preacher, tentatively and temporarily appointed to preach under the direction of the pastor. But later he was regularly assigned to supply a pulpit under the direction of the district superintendent, and, for all practical purposes, became a pastor, frequently being continued from year to year, until finally supply pastors were given a recognized place in the ministerial ranks and performed an indispensable service in the church. During the missionary period, when weak, scattered churches were grouped into pastoral charges, they were in continual demand as pioneer preachers. As the work expanded the call continued, and the supply pastor, an essential factor in the founding of Methodism, became an increasing factor in its development. Whenever economic conditions produced a considerable gap between the standard of living and ministerial salaries, both the actual and the proportionate number of supply pastors steadily increased. The advancing standards of ministerial preparation, involving a more thorough education, resulted in the failure of some useful men to gain admission into an annual conference, or in so discouraging them that they gave up the attempt, leaving to them the alternative either of relinquishing ministerial work entirely or of entering into the ranks of supply pastors.

b. General Conference action. — The General Conference in 1916 and 1920 made annual conference provisions for the care of aged or disabled local preachers. During the discussion many delegates were convinced that the support should be furnished by the church at large, rather than by annual conferences, and the Board of Conference Claimants was authorized to consider the subject and to "present the results of its deliberations to the Council of Boards of Benevolence, with suitable recommendations."

The disciplinary statement is as follows:

1. *By annual conferences*¹

"Authority is hereby given to the annual conferences to take such measures as they may deem wise to create a permanent endowment fund, or to raise money for annual distribution for retired local preachers who may have given fifteen consecutive years or more (giving their entire time as pastors to the work of the church) and for the widows and minor children of such deceased local preachers. The annual conference shall administer the funds and distribute the income through its Board of Stewards, as the annual conference may determine."

2. *By the Board of Conference Claimants*²

"Whereas, there is need of immediate consideration of providing for the old age of faithful supply pastors, therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Board of Conference Claimants be authorized to consider these matters, in order to accomplish the purpose stated in the preamble, and to present the results of its deliberations to the Council of Boards of Benevolence, with suitable recommendations.

² Discipline, ¶585.

"And further, that all reports and data bearing upon these interests be placed at the disposal of said board."

c. Board recommendations.—The board gave immediate consideration to the subject and recommended to the Council of Boards, as follows:

"The question of pensions for supply pastors, referred by the General Conference to the Board of Conference Claimants for study and recommendation, has been carefully considered, also memorials on this subject from churches, conferences, laymen's meetings, local preachers' associations, etc.; also the provisions of the Discipline for annual conference help (§226) and the problems involved in the development of a connectional or general plan."

We are convinced of the justice of doing something for those needy supply pastors who have served for many years without being admitted to an annual conference. One out of every four churches of Methodism is served by a supply pastor. The limitations in the legislation for annual conferences, which should be followed in a connectional plan, do not provide pensions for temporary supplies, or for local preachers who are engaged in secular occupations, or for students during their school years, or for supernumerary or retired ministers temporarily acting as supplies; but only for those who for fifteen consecutive years have faithfully devoted their entire time to ministerial work.

d. Action of the Council of Boards.—After consideration by a special committee, the Council of Boards of Benevolence voted that:

"In carrying out the will of the General Conference to provide for the relief of aged and disabled supply pastors, the Board of Conference Claimants be authorized:

"1. To complete the survey already undertaken, in order to understand more perfectly and to define more equitably the problem as it actually exists in the church, and to perfect a plan, based on the obligations of the church to make provision for the relief of aged and disabled supply pastors.

"2. To develop such unity in the plans for the relief of aged or disabled supply pastors as shall be in harmony with the general principles already operative in the church for the pensioning and relief of retired ministers, and to cultivate such a common interest between the supply pastors and the regular ministry as shall give the highest unity, accord and stability to the ministerial forces of the church.

"3. To make the first distribution to aged and disabled supply pastors in 1923, on the basis of the amount available in 1922."

For setting up the system and making a beginning for pressing necessities, the council provided a budget of $10,000, to be distributed in 1923.

2. SURVEY

a. Further investigation.—The board immediately began a thorough-going investigation of the supply appointments as printed in the General Minutes, in order to ascertain the actual number of supply charges and the salaries paid by them, and sent requests for information to 2,659 supply pastors, whose names and addresses were given in the annual conference minutes. For intelligent classification and study the conferences were divided into six groups: (1) Colored Conferences; (2) Foreign-Speaking Conferences; (3) Northeastern Conferences; (4) Prairie Conferences; (5) Southern and Border Conferences; (6) Rocky Mountain and Pacific Conferences.

Tabulations.—The tabulations show the number of supply pastors, the ratio of supply pastors to the total number of pastors, the average salary paid to supply pastors in the several groups and in the entire church.

b. Significant disclosures—

1. The number of supply pastors has increased greatly during the last twenty years. There were:

In 1900, 2,782 supply pastors.

In 1910, 3,749 " " Increase 967

In 1920, 4,321 " " " 572

Total Increase, 1900-1920,1,539

The increase from 1900 to 1910 was thirty-five per cent; from 1910 to 1920, fifteen per cent; from 1900 to 1920, fifty-five per cent.

2. Not only was there a large increase in the number and percentage of supply pastors, but also a large increase in the ratio of the supply pastors. In 1900, nineteen per cent of the total pastoral charges were served by supply pastors; but in 1920, twenty-six per cent were so served.

3. The average salary of the supply pastors, $720, is larger than has generally been supposed. In four conferences it was more than $1,000.

4. The increase of both the number and the percentage of supply pastors in the prosperous groups is large, contrary to the general opinion that supply pastors are used mostly in small and weak conferences.

5. While the total number of supply pastors is large, 4,321, most of them regard their work as temporary. Among them are college students, or supernumerary or retired ministers, who will be provided for in old age as conference claimants, or men engaged in secular pursuits, to whom the supply ministry offers an opportunity for service.

6. The facts and conditions disclosed after the first payment has been made will suggest the legislation which should be recommended to the next General Conference. The records of all supplies are now under scrutiny, and the facts concerning their ministry are being secured and tabulated for future use, but to secure a complete roster and comprehensive data of permanent value will require time and patience.

For distribution during 1923, $9,000 is now on hand; and $20,000 has been placed in the Advance Program for this purpose.

IV. SUSTENTATION

1. GENERAL CONFERENCE ACTION

The General Conference of 1920 took the following action:

"The need of special sustentation work for the emergencies of ministerial life, especially in the weaker conferences, was referred to the Board of Conference Claimants, and the board was directed to present the results of its deliberations to the Council of Boards with suitable recommendations."

a. Legislation for Sustentation by Annual Conferences.

"It shall be the duty of each annual conference, whenever practicable, to organize

b. Action on Sustentation by the General Conference 1920.

"Whereas, there is need of special sustentation work for the emergencies of ministerial life, especially in the weaker places,

"Resolved, that the Board of Conference Claimants be authorized to consider these matters, in order to accomplish the purpose stated in the preamble, and to present the results of their deliberations to the Council of Boards of Benevolence with suitable recommendations."²

2. A THOROUGH-GOING SURVEY

During 1923 a thorough-going survey of the entire situation as to sustentation will be completed and, as directed by the General Conference, "the board will present the results of its deliberations to the Council of Boards of Benevolence with suitable recommendations."²

In the Advance Program, there has been placed $25,000 for sustentation.

V. THE BASIS OF THE ASKINGS

General Conference action, 1920.—"Most of the campaign work for endowment funds during the last quadrennium was co-operative, in some cases under the immediate leadership of the board. The principal effort was directed toward securing and increasing endowments for annual conferences.

"In the program of the coming quadrennium these endowments in annual conferences should be provided for and should be completed, if possible. To do this the Board of Conference Claimants should be adequately financed in order to lend aid to the annual conferences for this purpose and to furnish requisite literature and immediate assistance through its representatives, so that the $5,000,000 that is still needed by annual conference organizations should be secured. The board ought also to be enabled to secure an addition of ten million dollars to its permanent fund, the income of which shall perpetually help the poorer and weaker conferences in the remote and difficult fields, and all necessitous cases in every conference.

A major interest.—"The ideal for the quadrennium should be the securing of sufficient funds to complete the major program for all conference claimants throughout the church. In any general church-wide financial program or campaign undertaken during the coming quadrennium, an adequate amount for retired ministers, widows and orphans of ministers shall be included so that the unfortunate situation developed in the Centenary activities shall not be repeated, and in the future the cause of the minister, active and retired, shall be included in the major programs of the church and the interests of conference claimants be carefully safeguarded; therefore, be it

"Resolved, That, should there be any general or connectional financial program in the church during the coming quadrennium, there shall be included such an amount as will make it possible for annual conferences to meet all their obligations to their ministers, and as will enable the Board of Conference Claimants to extend adequate and needed help to all those retired ministers, widows and orphans of ministers at home and abroad who, on account of the conditions under which they work or their immediate necessities, should receive the helping hand of the entire church.

"In this manner the major purposes for which the Board of Conference Claimants was organized, as stated in the Discipline, ¶485, may be speedily accomplished.

"In the Advance Program, $60,000 has been allowed for administrative purposes, and $20,000 for general work."

AT AN EPWORTH LEAGUE INSTITUTE

The church that is wise toward youth will shine as the stars Our problem today is fashioning that new generation of human life, in its thoughts, its ideals, its spirit, its character, its attitudes to life, its relation to Jesus Christ, its place in the world. It is rapidly being made and the world of to-morrow is being made with it We must make the makers of tomorrow.

I. HISTORICAL STATEMENT

The General Conference of 1892 recognized and officially adopted the Epworth League, which three years before, at Cleveland, Ohio, had been formed by the merging of five young people's societies operating within the church.

The organization was given a form of constitution and its general aim as expressed in the legislation was "to promote intelligent and vital piety in the young members and friends of the Church, to aid them in the attainment of purity of heart and constant growth in grace, and to train them in works of mercy and help."

Each General Conference since 1892 has scrutinized the record and relationship of its young people's organization and after improvements, from time to time, aimed at more perfect adaptation of the society to its task, has given it official approval. At Des Moines in 1920 the General Conference gave it for the first time the standing of one of the regular benevolent Boards of the church.²

plishment of great results, far beyond the dreams of the devoted and courageous founders. As the official young people's society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Epworth League has made for itself a large place in the hearts and life of Methodist youth. Through it they have accepted, gladly, their share of the church's task and their share of its responsibility. The League's training in leadership has produced hundreds of our church leaders and its emphasis on a well-informed membership has produced an intelligent laity. Its study classes, its institutes, its training conferences, have been of great value in acquainting young people with the various phases of need and activity related directly and indirectly to the church's program. Coupled with this educational program, the opportunity for expressional activities has been tremendously valuable.

The League in its whole program seeks to stress on behalf of boys and girls of probationers' age, carefully directed courses of training in intelligent membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, for the young people of the Senior Chapters, training and direction for intelligent service within their own church and as Christian citizens in their own communities.

It should be remembered in studying this statement that the actual membership of the League is limited to those who join by voluntary act and that the number recorded as members does not indicate the actual strength of the League. There is a large percentage of loyal constituents who contribute to and are helped by the League program who are not represented by its reported statistics.

"Young People's Work for Young People" means that, in co-operation with the pastor, the young people themselves, from their own initiative, plan and direct their work in accordance with the general constitution of the Epworth League. This involves the building of Christian character, co-operation with other Christian forces, the Christian conquest of the evils of the social and economic order, and Christian comradeship in the community. The work of the Epworth League is divided into four departments.

The First Department concerns the building of Christian character, for which there are weekly devotional meetings, Bible study classes, "Win My Chum" campaigns, co-operation with junior work, the Morning Watch, and life work.

The Second Department concerns Christian stewardship and mission study; there are study classes, reading courses, and the enrolment of tithing stewards.

The Third Department concerns vital social and moral questions in the community. It promotes good citizenship, the enrolment and aid of first voters, law enforcement, Sabbath observance, mercy and help, visits to civic institutions, employment bureaus, and the Booth Festival.

The Fourth Department concerns Christian comradeship in the use of leisure time and the general promotion of culture. Here the membership of the League is recruited, Epworth Herald interests are advanced, institute delegations are secured, and literary, musical, social, and outing programs arranged.

II. THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN THE UNITED STATES

1. EPWORTH LEAGUE ORGANIZATION

The present Epworth League organization in the United States consists of 18,471 local chapters, both Senior and Junior, with 638,865 members. Of 462 districts, 335 have standardized League organizations, leaving 127 unorganized.

Sixty-three per cent of all charges have Epworth League Chapters; but the average in typical organized districts is seventy-three per cent, and in unorganized, twenty-four per cent. This would seem to indicate that the district as a working unit must be developed. This can be done most effectively by an Epworth League worker for the area, whose duty it is to organize districts and local chapters, and to co-ordinate the activities of the young people with those of the general church. Calls are multiplying from the field asking that such help be sent. In practically all cases the young people themselves are willing and eager to undertake a share of the responsibility, but provision must be made for a constantly expanding program, so that when the young people desire a worker and are willing to undertake his support, it may be provided for through the general League budget.

There are at present four field Secretaries at work in various sections of the country, in the Wichita Area, the California Conference, the Blue-Ridge Atlantic and Holston Conferences, and the Portland District of the Maine Conference.

2. DEPARTMENT ACTIVITIES AND NEEDS

Departmental secretaries.—If the Board of the Epworth League is to provide a balanced program an equally important provision must be made for more departmental secretaries in the Central Office.

The program for each department should be under the special direction of a worker selected for that form of activity, who will promote its interests.

Morning Watch enrolment for 1922

The Second Department has demonstrated what results can be obtained when this is done. In no work has the Epworth League shown greater advance than in its Mission Study and Stewardship Department, as is indicated in the report of that Department.

a. First Department

Win-My-Chum.—The growth of the Win-My-Chum idea, the Epworth League's program of personal evangelism, might easily be doubled both in the number of campaigns and in results if district and local First Vice-Presidents were given opportunity to study the Win-My-Chum plans, especially the preparation for and the method of the campaign.

Morning Watch Movement.—The Morning Watch movement enrolled during the two years, 1920 and 1921, about 3,000 Epworthians, while in the year of 1922 when some special attention was given to its promotion the enrolment increased to 4,298. The cultivation of the prayer habit is absolutely essential for a vital Christianity in the church. It is seen that by interesting the youth of today, the leader of tomorrow will be equipped with the necessary tools for Kingdom building.

Bible Study.—Bible study classes occupy no small place in the Epworth League program. Our courses have been broadening in every way, for the text-books adopted on the recommendation of the Central Office are comprehensive in their treatment of the leading movements and characters of both Old and New Testaments.

Needs of the First Department.—The needs of the First Department include:

1. A secretary to plan and promote the interests of the First Department.
2. Development of training conferences for district and local First Vice-Presidents. The ideal would be to hold each year at least one conference on First Department methods in every district under the leadership of an experienced worker.
3. The distribution of free literature.

If provision can be made for these needs, the spiritual value of the League and its contribution to the church will be greatly increased and the development of the spiritual life of our young people will go forward in a splendid way.

b. Second Department

Growth of mission study.—In 1917 the number of mission study classes was 850; in 1918, 2,005; in 1919, 2,508; in 1920, 3,002; in 1921, 5,026.

During this period of four years, there has probably been a total enrolment in mission study classes of one-half million young people.

Mission study in the institutes.—Mission study forms a part of institute programs, both summer and mid-year. The leaders for local classes gather at the institutes to learn how best to present the mission-study books to their groups in the local chapters.

The period of emphasis.—In January and February, when the devotional meeting topics are based upon a mission-study textbook, the whole Epworth League turns its attention for six weeks to the church's kingdom program. Mission study is also promoted during the fall through classes outside of the devotional meeting.

Constant emphasis is placed upon the value of and the necessity for real study. The purpose is to educate our young people in kingdom geography, kingdom biography, and modern kingdom history.

Missionary readers.—As a supplement to the mission-study class, there is individual

Distribution of mission-study classes by states, 1922

reading of missionary books under what is known as the Methodist Million Readers plan. Many thousands of young people have pledged to read at least one missionary book during 1922-23.

With all of these splendid accomplishments, the possibilities of increased efficiency are not exhausted. There are yet several thousand chapters whose members should be enrolled in the definite study of missions.

The department ideal.—The desire and ideal of the Second Department is expressed in its motto, "That They May Know." If this ideal is to be realized, three methods of promotion must be followed:

1. Normal training courses for all teachers of institute classes.
2. Area Conferences for the Second Vice-Presidents of the districts.
3. District Conferences for local Second Vice-Presidents.

Stewardship.—Another activity of the Second Department is the promotion of Christian stewardship. Epworthians are acquainted with all phases of stewardship, including that of time, talents, and service, as well as of possessions through consideration of the subject in study classes and devotional meetings.

As a result of this program, not less than fifty thousand tithers have been enrolled during the past three years, as follows: 1920—40,000; 1921—5,000; 1922—5,000. The importance of this enrolment to the church cannot be over-estimated.

The goal which is set for the enrolment of Christian Stewards within the next ten years is 500,000. This will be accomplished through an educational program promoted largely through literature covering the whole field of Christian stewardship, especially adapted to the needs of young people.

Year round promotion is emphasized. Through study classes in both summer and mid-year institutes, and through the study of approved texts, through reading contests and other educational features in local chapters, Epworthians are learning to "Crown Him Lord of All."

c. The Third Department

Social Service.—The advance which the Second Department has made is but an indication of the possibilities for strengthening and expanding each department, if adequate leadership is provided. Our Epworthians should have careful training in the principles and methods of real Christ-like service. The Epworth League is as greatly interested in the securing of Christian business men and consecrated Christian citizens for America, as it is in sending teachers to China.

Mission-study classes—1921-1922

The present program.—For many years the Third Department was exceedingly weak but recently there has been a new expanding motive and obligation for service. The present program for the Third Department includes:

1. The stressing of the service motive during the year in the devotional meeting.

2. The study and practice of Christian citizenship through study classes and the devotional meeting, in campaigns of law enforcement and an active interest in legislation.

3. This distribution of literature. Material is now available for only a few phases of social service work.

4. Co-operation with our Methodist benevolent institutions through the Booth Festival, a program of recreation and service, which, in 1922, was carried out by twenty-one districts. The total amount of supplies and money thus donated was more than $16,000. Probably other festivals were held which have not been reported.

5. The promotion of service activities. The service work now being carried on by Epworthians is both surprising and commendable. The activities reported include Fresh Air Farms supported by more than one district or conference, outings for slum children and for aged folks during the summer months, a year-around Kindergarten financed by one district,

Signed Stewardship cards in the Central Office files, if stacked, would make a pile nearly fifty feet high and a Traveler's Aid Deaconess in one of our large cities, entirely supported by Epworthians. Fourteen scholarships in training schools and colleges are provided through the liberality of Epworthians. Three chapters have equipped and are directing community play grounds.

In addition to these outstanding accomplishments, Epworthians are actively engaged in giving personal service to scores of orphanages, missions, hospitals, almshouses, jails, old people's homes, and to churches in foreign-speaking communities.

Needs of the Third Department.—If the Third Department program is to keep abreast of the new and vital needs of Christian service—there must be:

1. Adequate and efficient leadership. The time is now ripe to add a specialist in Social Service activity.

2. A service program big enough to challenge the interest of our thinking young people.

3. Some method by which social and economic problems may be placed before Epworthians. Probably the best beginning would be through the preparation of informational literature.

d. The Fourth Department

Recreation and culture.—The Epworth League was the pioneer in Methodism in recognizing the need for, and developing the program of, recreation. For several years it has provided an increasing number of text-books with suggested programs and outlines for recreational activities.

When the General Conference in 1920 opened the way for new responsibilities and opportunities for leadership in recreation, the response of the Fourth Department was immediate and gratifying. Since that time a large number (estimated roughly at about one in twenty-five) of Fourth Vice-Presidents have undertaken the task of recreational direction in the local churches.

According to estimates based on reports of district officers, the Epworth League touches over 2,200,000 young people each year through its recreational program. The importance of this is found in the fact that when young people play together it is easier for them to pray together.

The ideal of the Fourth Department, as it is expressed in the words, "The best life must lead and not trail," has the suggestion of the great possibilities for constant service if the Fourth Department in the local chapter can be given the aid which it so greatly needs.

Each year brings a larger number of commercialized amusements that urge their attention upon young life. It becomes increasingly important, therefore, that there shall be provision for clean, wholesome recreation especially for young people.

Epworthians have a large opportunity to influence the recreational life of their communities. In a multitude of cases they are accomplishing results, but there are tremendous possibilities in large numbers of untouched fields.

There should be a director of Fourth Department activities to aid in planning programs for various types of chapters that will challenge the attention of the young people of the whole community; to prepare literature that will give adequate information concerning methods of play; to adapt the recreational program so that it will successfully care for the college group, the intermediate group and the rural chapters.

In no phase of young people's activity is the masterhood of Jesus Christ more greatly needed than in recreation. The church through the Epworth League can make a contribution to young life that will mean not only stronger bodies, but more alert minds, more helpful social contacts and better developed Christian characters.

3. EPWORTH LEAGUE INSTITUTES

Rapid growth.—The Epworth League Institute traces an unbroken history back to the year 1906.

In 1910, there were seven institutes under the direction of the Central Office. They were at Mount Hermon, California; Bonner Springs, Kansas; Lake Minnetonka, Minnesota; Byron Camp Grounds,

One hundred and seven Epworth League Institutes in the United States in 1922

Wisconsin; Cazenovia, New York; Sea Cliff, New York; Mountain Lake Park, Maryland.

In 1911, there were six Institutes; in 1912, eight; in 1913, twelve; in 1914, eight-teen; in 1915, nineteen; in 1916, thirty; in 1917, thirty-three; in 1918, forty-four; in 1919, fifty-eight; in 1920, seventy-five; in 1921, eighty-seven; and in 1922, one hundred seven. Seventeen new Institutes have been registered so that for 1923, we have at least one hundred twenty-four planned, some of which minister to the young people of the foreign speaking and colored conferences.

Certain institutes are under the direction of district organizations while others minister to annual conferences.

Widely distributed.—These institutes are distributed over the whole of the United States and nearly every state is represented.

The institute idea is spreading to foreign lands wherever Epworth League work is found. India, the Philippine Islands, Malaysia, South America and Mexico have reported splendid results while other countries are planning for these gatherings.

Institute objectives.—The institute objectives are:

A better knowledge of the Bible.

A better knowledge of the needs of the world in the light of God's Word through Mission Study.

A better understanding of the significance of Christ's great commission and our relation thereto through the study of Christian stewardship.

Better methods of work in Junior and Senior Epworth Leagues, the Sunday school, and the church.

A better understanding of the work of our church at home and abroad and the Chart showing yearly summer institute attendance needs in men and money to do the work

The promotion of evangelism among young people through study classes and Win-My-Chum campaigns.

The development of wholesome, constructive recreation.

The enlistment of those who feel a call to Christian life service under the direction of the church.

In order to reach these objectives the program includes four major divisions: devotional hours, class study periods, recreation, and inspirational meetings and worship.

Lunch time at institute

Daily schedules.—The study schedules are arranged in a four-year cycle, during which the interests of each department receive special emphasis and cumulative development.

The afternoons are given to directed recreation and the evenings to social clinics and inspirational meetings.

The climax of the week comes on Sunday when the call to life service is presented.

Life service.—Out of the institutes of the last five years have come the names of 12,569 young people who have signed cards indicating it to be their purpose to give their lives to some form of Christian service. Not all of these are full time service but the Commission on Life Service is at present in correspondence with more than half of these.

Most of them are in high school, college, university, seminary or training school preparing themselves for some definite form of service under the direction of the church, for one of the matters that is stressed at the institute is the importance of careful preparation. Every summer hundreds are inspired to go to college. One of our educational leaders has

In 1918 there were some 12,000 Epworthians registered at the summer institutes

In 1922 the registration total was well over 30,000. In the span of five years the number has been multiplied two and one-half times

Each figure represents 2,000 Leaguers

Mission-study class at summer institute publicly declared that the Epworth League Institute has no small part in crowding the colleges of our church as well as our state institutions.

Already in the ministry and in various forms of service in the home and foreign work of the church there is a splendid company who point to the Epworth League Institute as the place where they received either the initial or the determining impulse to find in Christian service their life vocation.

One out of twenty of the youth of our church has been in such a training camp during the past summer and is at home again diffusing the leaven of holy zeal and consecration.

Mid-year institutes.—The newest development of the institute idea is the Mid-year or Indoor Institute. The young people themselves have been asking how they might take the institute inspiration, program, and method to their local chapters.

Provision has been made to adapt the summer program to the district, sub-district, city union, or local church group.

Pastors' class at summer institute

Every precaution is taken to keep the standard of work up to that of the larger summer institute.

The Mid-year Institute puts within the reach of all the members the training that the summer institutes have planned for the district and chapter officers of the Leagues.

This new and intensive form of training is meeting with enthusiastic response. In 1922, more than two hundred Mid-year Institutes were reported. This new door for training stands wide open and unites the Institute Department to a service it is eager to render.

Institute goals.—The goals toward which the Epworth League is working in its institutes are in part as follows:

1. A summer institute within reach of every chapter.
2. A mid-year institute available for every Epworthian.
3. Every cabinet officer attending an institute.

4. THE JUNIOR EPWORTH LEAGUE

Purpose and program.—The Junior League through its program adapted to boys and girls between the ages of nine and fifteen, seeks to train them in and prepare them for church membership.

The Junior League holds a unique place in the church. It affords the pastor opportunity for fulfilling his obligation for the religious instruction of the children by preparing them for and supplementing the work of the pastor's class.

It prepares for this class by helping boys and girls to find themselves in the church through acquaintance with its history, doctrines, government, and activities.

It prepares for church membership by laying the foundation for an intelligent and well-grounded decision for Christ.

It trains in church membership through the formation of groups in which the boys and girls become members of a quarterly conference, directors of a new church, secretaries of the various boards of benevolence, and members of the Council of Boards of Benevolence.

It educates the Juniors as world citizens through the activity of the Neighborhood Club—a band of American Junior Leaguers adopting an “Amigo Intimo” or “Best Friend” in some foreign field, thereby effecting a direct friendly intercourse between the home and foreign field.

It lays foundation for a life of stewardship through its emphasis on every phase of stewardship principles.

It trains in church membership by acquainting the boys and girls with the work of the kingdom today in its classes in mission study.

It lays enduring basis for the spirit of service through its training in various forms of service activities. Several thousand dollars have been subscribed to the various home and foreign mission projects through the Junior chapters outside of the suggested activities.

It trains in church membership by promoting wholesome recreation under the auspices of the church.

It provides through its devotional meetings the cultivation of devotional expression.

Needs.—It seems incredible that a program so inclusive and making such splendid provision for the adequate vital religious training of boys and girls and their preparation for church membership is not more eagerly seized by a greater number of churches as an important part of their program.

There is a serious lack in the number of Junior chapters in various areas. This lack should be corrected and can be if a few but tremendously important needs can be supplied:

1. More training conferences for workers.

2. Additions to the Junior League staff by the provision of field workers.

3. Some organizers in particular territories who will give at least part of their time to distinct promotion of Junior League work.

Looking forward.—The projected program of the Junior League as planned for 1923 shows clearly how imperative are the above needs if the ideals of this great organization are to be realized.

Carrying out the general theme, Evangelism, the Junior League subject for the year is "Saving the World Through the Boys and Girls."

The method of presenting this topic will be by the study of

1. Wholesome Living — The Immigrant.

2. Christian Education—American Indians and Southern Highlanders.

3. Christian Homes — Latin-Americans.

4. Christian Ideals—Children's Homes.

5. God's Own Word—Bible Boys and Girls.

6. Our Influence—Playground, School, and Church.

Junior League Statistics.—The Juniors are enthusiastic supporters of the Twenty-four-Hour-Day Plan. There are 690 Twenty-four-Hour-Day Junior chapters enrolled representing 16,591 Junior Leaguers.

Ten countries are represented in the Neighborhood Club.

The registration in the Junior Methods class during the 1922 institute season was 3,189; 923 of these young people promised definitely to organize local Junior Leagues.

During 1921 and 1922, a Junior League extension program for boys and girls was conducted in twenty-six camp meetings. In 1921, 1,411 new chapters of the Junior League were organized.

5. NEGRO EPWORTH LEAGUES

An encouraging program.—The League program in our Negro Conferences is constantly developing.

The growth of the institutes is an index to the life of the entire program. In 1922, at Claflin University the whole school was given over to the institute program for a week with very encouraging success. It is expected that the educational centers will be utilized in a like manner in increasing numbers.

Great emphasis is being placed upon Third Department activities. Negro Epworthians learn the relation of a young Christian to his community and practice Christian ideals of citizenship by undertaking "Clean-Up Weeks" and similar campaigns. Recreation is in great need of careful attention. Booth Festivals are rapidly increasing in number and scope and make the young people happy in consciousness of service rendered.

6. SPECIAL EPWORTH LEAGUE GROUPS

Intermediates.—The young people included in the Intermediate group are receiving the attention of a special committee appointed by the Board of the Epworth League so that the problem of the adaptation of the whole program to their needs will be solved.

College groups.—The college young people constitute a group offering a large opportunity for real service. Programs and suggestions especially adapted to their needs are being introduced and tried with success. The next few years should show marked results and a real contribution to the church.

Foreign-speaking groups.—An almost untouched field of opportunity lies in the Southwest among the Spanish-speaking young people. Many urgent calls have come asking for translation of both Senior and Junior chapter literature into Spanish. While some of the literature prepared for Mexico will serve, other material will be necessary. Special programs for activities will also be required.

The young people of Europe who come to America as the land of opportunity should have attention through especially prepared suggestions for service activities and study classes. The Epworth Leagues of our German Conferences have a secretary whose work it will be to standardize their program and their support. The need, as a League leader in Europe states, is that our young people come to know and work with their European comrades who have come to America.

Work has begun in many centers for Chinese and Japanese Epworthians who appreciate greatly the interest of the League. Recently a Chinese chapter on the Pacific Coast sent a contribution to provide food for a Fellowship Hour for a chapter in Vienna.

7. HAWAIIAN EPWORTH LEAGUES

The Epworth League in Hawaii consists of twenty-four chapters, fourteen Senior and ten Junior, with a membership of 468 Seniors and 198 Juniors, making a total of 666. This number seems small, but it is a nucleus from which great things may be expected if adequate support is forthcoming. The young people of Hawaii need young people's work as much as do the young people of other lands and they rightly look to the United States for the satisfaction of their desires.

Present program.—The present program is carried on in four languages, English, Filipino, Korean, and Japanese. Classes in mission study, Bible study, stewardship and social service have been reported.

Needs.—(1) A trained secretary who can give at least part time to the development of Epworth League activities.

(2) An adequate supply of League literature translated into various languages. At present there is none available except in English.

8. THE TWENTY-FOUR-HOUR-DAY PLAN

The financial plan adopted by the Epworth League operates in a most satisfactory manner. It is called the Twenty-four-Hour-Day Plan because the funds secured through it make possible a large share of the forward program of the League which is operating twenty-four hours in every day. Its scope includes all of the countries where the Epworth League is organized.

Minimum expectations.—Local chapters are expected under the ruling of the Board of the Epworth League to pledge at least one-fourth of their membership under the Twenty-four-Hour-Day Plan. This means for the Senior member, besides his contribution to the local budget, the payment of two cents a week for general work through the Central Office. Junior members are asked for one cent a week. Upon the adoption of this plan by one fourth of the membership all other Central Office obligations are cancelled.

Chart showing percentage of Senior chapters, by areas, which have adopted the 24-hour-day plan

Twenty-four-hour-day payments, June 1, 1921 to May 31, 1922

Above the minimum.—When chapters enlist more than one fourth of their membership, they are permitted to assign a fair proportion of their contribution to intensive work within the area, conference, or district, and to some foreign field for League work. Under this plan, the support of Mexico is being undertaken by the Leaguers of the Pittsburgh Annual Conference. The Wichita Area provides for the support of the Epworth League Secretary and his work in India. The Detroit Area is caring for the League budget in China. The Epworthians of the Fort Wayne District contribute largely to Dr. Hauser's work in South America. Other groups "pull their share of the load" by giving some assistance to other fields. Among these should be mentioned Epworthians of the Central New York Conference and the Nebraska Conference who are assisting splendidly in the support of League work in South America.

Results of the plan.—The official financial plan of the League provides for;

1. The work of the general organization,
2. The foreign program and its expansion,
3. Intensive work within the bounds of the local area, conference, and district.

That the plan is popular and effective is evidenced by the steadily increasing payments reported for the years, 1919-1922.

1919—	$10,795.85
1920—	16,543.46
1921—	17,466.89
1922—	26,435.63

The total number of chapters which have adopted the plan is 2,574, representing an enrolment of 64,373. The increase since 1917 has been phenomenal. During that year sixty-four chapters enlisted, while this year 434 have officially adopted it. Of the total number, sixty-five are enlisted as 100 per cent honor chapters, 243 have at least seventy-five per cent of their members enrolled.

District progress.—At present there are 158 districts with less than twenty-five per cent of their chapter enrolled as Twenty-four-Hour-Day Leagues, ninety-four districts having between twenty-five and fifty per cent of their chapters enlisted. Thirty-four districts have between fifty and seventy-five per cent of their chapters enrolled and in fifteen districts, between seventy-five and one hundred per cent of the chapters have adopted the Twenty-four-Hour-Day Plan.

III. THE EPWORTH LEAGUE IN FOREIGN FIELDS¹

1. JAPAN

Present status.—The situation in Japan differs from that in the other oriental countries, because of the fact that our work, like that of the rest of the church, is so closely linked with the work of the Canadian and Southern Methodists.

These denominations excel us in their young people's work, and we should, at the earliest possible moment, add our cooperation. Only by joint action can we approach efficient use of our talents and the call of the millions of youth in Japan must be heard with other calls in careful fairness.

There are about 3,970 Senior Leaguers in Japan belonging to 159 different chapters, while the Juniors number 1,123 in fifty-two chapters. In 1918, there was no Epworth League organization whatever. Seven of the fourteen districts are loosely organized, but with development, the district will be the most effective administrative unit.

Needs.—The first and special field to which the Epworth League should turn its attention is that of the student class, one of the outstanding groups in Japan.

The chief criticism of Japanese education is its materialism. Educationalists are saying that the need is for more effective moral and religious teaching. Most of the missions are giving special attention to student work, but the field is practically untouched. The Epworth League must add its bit.

¹The statistics in these surveys of foreign countries have been obtained from reports sent to the Central Office from workers on the field.

There should be some provision for at least the part-time services of a secretary to lead the Epworthians of Japan, and actively assist in arranging a program that will adequately represent the young people's work for the church. The secretary for Korea and this worker for Japan could co-operate in many joint enterprises.

For printed Epworth League helps, only one manual is available. The first and fourth departments should have special and immediate provision of manuals and programs, while an adequate supply of suggestions for other activities should not long be delayed.

2. KOREA

Unguided youth.—In Korea, the young people are flocking to the church in numbers. They are coming unguided without the advice and help that they have a right to expect. In practically every community the young people are forming groups. Many of these groups were organized at first in churches, but because nothing was offered to them in the way of a program or help they are going elsewhere, away from the church for their meetings. It is only within the last three years that the young people of Korea have been getting together in their organizations. It is a new Korea and the young people are moving forward.

Needs.—Because of this marked and sudden change, the need is not only great in Korea, it is also urgent. The demands for various forms of assistance are frequent and insistent.

1. The need for a secretary

There has been, during 1922, a marked change of attitude on the part of missionary leaders and Korean pastors. In 1921, when the problem of the young people was discussed, everyone agreed that something should be done by the church, but there was little direct enthusiasm.

In 1922, at the Annual Conference, the Epworth League was urged to appoint a secretary immediately for Korea. There are many reasons why this need is so urgent:

1. The young people are leaving the church to conduct their activities elsewhere.

2. The Sunday school is not reaching the adolescent youth.

3. There is tremendous difficulty in holding the young people in balanced lines of church activities. Bishop Welch has stated that this is one of the greatest problems in our work in Korea today.

4. There is taking place now a most critical change in the social order, a breaking down of old standards of separation of the sexes in social meetings. The influx of foreign ideas and ideals will not permit the isolation of men and women much longer, so that the church, if it is to lead the thought of the country, must build a sane basis for society. The logical place to begin is with the young people.

5. The young people are inflamed with the desire to do something. They are waiting for the message, eager to be taught. In the gripping statement of the Epworth League Committee for Korea, "With a secretary to prepare and explain a program for young people, the League would enrol ten thousand members within a year." Some of the members insisted that ten thousand was too low a figure.

Such a challenging opportunity must not be neglected, for it is impossible to state how long it will last. It must be seized immediately.

The Annual Conference of the Methodist missionaries of both the Board of Foreign Missions and of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, passed resolutions in June, 1922, asking the Central Office for a secretary for Korea. The Policy Committee of the Korea Conference, composed of representatives from the district, the Board of Foreign Missions, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, both men and women, foreign and Korean, asked that the Central Office of the Epworth League send out a specialist in young people's work as soon as possible.

It is agreed, even by the Koreans themselves, that the Epworth League must be put under strong foreign leadership if it is to do the work which it should.

However, a Korean secretary should also be appointed to co-operate with the foreign secretary and assist in adapting the general program of the Epworth League to the specific needs of the country.

2. Literature

A manual of Epworth League work, which has been translated, is waiting publication only for lack of funds. Departmental literature particularly adapted to the needs of Korea and standardized helps for devotional meetings should be prepared.

The First and Fourth departments need special emphasis, helps for which are absolutely necessary if the young people are to be held after they have been organized.

3. Institutes

As in other countries, training the workers by means of institutes is highly necessary. While the movement is new, some faculty members will have to be provided from outside the country.

3. CHINA

A secretary in China.—With the appointment of an Epworth League Secretary for China, it was found that most of the societies known as Epworth Leagues were in reality simply groups of folks old and young who knew very little of the League's program and ideals.

The task therefore has been primarily to standardize the existing work and not to do extensive organization.

There are now forty-three Epworth League chapters in China, thirty-five Senior and eight Junior, with a total membership of 5,235 of which 4,805 are Senior and 430 Junior.

Present program.—The Epworth League program in China includes a weekly devotional meeting, probably the strongest feature; a six weeks' mission-study class which is usually held in connection with the regular devotional service; assistance in the evangelistic campaigns of the church and sometimes a League Win-My-Chum campaign; the organization of gospel teams for definite work; the enrolling of Christian stewards; and an occasional recreational program. League work is being carried on both in North and South Mandarin and in three or four dialects, as well. A few pieces of literature have been published in Chinese. The Year Book contains suggestions for the devotional meetings and the Epworth League Manual has been made available in both English and Chinese.

Needs.—The needs of the Epworth League in China are very extensive and urgent. It is true of the whole world, but of China especially, that the young people must be won immediately if the nation is to be Christian. There never has been a nation which has exhibited such remarkable activity in politics, in business, in social changes and, in the last few years, in spiritual matters.

The Young China movement is sweeping every phase of Chinese life, its influence will not be denied. What these energetic orientals most need and desire is education and they are taking advantage of every opportunity to satisfy this need. With the promising beginning which has already been made and the interest that has been awakened, the Epworth League holds a prominent strategic position in winning China for Christ. Valuable helps which should be supplied are unlimited in number but there are many needs which are indispensable if the Chinese Epworth League shall continue to function as it ought.

1. Literature

It is absolutely necessary that the workers have social service suggestions for their young people, as well as recreational and social suggestions and biographies for study classes.

Very nearly as important are libraries for general reading and a long list of Junior League books.

Reliable material upon such subjects as the relation of science to religion and the inadequacy of moral philosophy must be provided for the inquiring student class which is increasing rapidly every day and whose needs can be met only by Christianity.

2. Additional workers

There should be added to the staff of workers a stenographer, who is urgently needed to care for the routine work and to enable the secretary to give more time to the expansion of League activities; a translator; four Chinese field secretaries for the supervision and extension of the work in all parts of China.

3. Institutes

The organization of institutes is under way and must be pushed vigorously because of the great importance attached to the training of the young Chinese.

4. MALAYSIA

A good start.—While we have no paid secretary for Malaysia, some organization work has been done with the result that the number of Leagues has increased from thirteen in 1920 to twenty-two in 1921, and from 832 members to 1,623. This increase is an indication of what may be expected if the League program can be carried forward. The Junior Chapters show even a more marked increase. From a membership in 1911 of 211 they have nearly tripled that number.

A standard institute.—The Penang Institute was highly successful. It is conducted on a three year course basis with a certificate of graduation. Some idea of the value of the Institute may be gained when one sees that among the text books used were "The Church of the First Apostles" by C. H. Morgan, "New Life Currents in China" by Mary Ninde Gamewell, and "Stewardship Starting Points" by Calkins.

Literature available.—A thousand copies of the English translation of the Topics Book prepared by Miss Geraldine Townsend, the League Secretary for China, have been printed for use in Malaysia. It is the plan to co-ordinate and correlate work of the Epworth Leagues in China and Malaysia by strong co-operation in every way. There are also some leaflets and booklets on "Tithing", but other than these the supply is very meager.

A projected program.—The aims of the Epworth League in Malaysia are in part:

1. A Senior and Junior chapter at every day school.

2. The Epworth League enlisting the young people of every church community.

3. A membership goal of 3,000 Seniors and 1,220 Juniors.

4. Institute expansion.

5. Christian literature in homes of young people through League libraries and tracts.

6. Promotion of stewardship in every chapter.

7. A workable program for each department.

Needs.—The high rates of exchange make greater financial aid imperative. There should be supplied a budget for at least a part time secretary, with provision for his traveling expenses. There must also be literature for all the departments. Since about half of the Leagues conduct their services in the vernacular, a proportionate amount for translation should be added.

5. PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Growth since 1918.—There is no field of Epworth League work which has exhibited such remarkable growth in the past four years as the Philippine Islands. On the other hand, there are few places which offer such unlimited opportunities for expansion. The intellectual advance of these people is familiar to America. The League has the potential power to keep pace with the many forward movements. The young Filipinos depend upon America for support and guidance.

There are now 122 League chapters organized in the Islands, thirty-nine Senior and eighty-three Junior, with a membership of 1,685 Seniors, and 5,416 Juniors, totaling 7,101. Practically all of this organization has taken place since 1918, only eight chapters having been reported before that time.

A successful institute.—The outstanding feature was a very successful Institute with splendid results both as a training school and in the consecration of young lives. Institute activity must be greatly enlarged if the League is to function in the way we all wish.

League work is carried on chiefly in the English language, though some is in Tagalog.

There is very little literature available, only a few Central Office leaflets, for many of them are not adapted to the peculiar needs of the Filipinos. A very small amount is spent on publications.

Needs.—It is absolutely necessary, if League work is to be carried on as a forward movement, that one thousand dollars be secured for the purpose of printing promotion literature and for increasing the influence of the institute which has accomplished so much in the past. The returns in Christian leadership are sure to more than compensate for any expenditure, however great.

6. INDIA

Three decades of history.—On May 22, 1888, Dr. E. W. Parker, later bishop, organized the Oxford League for his station and district at Moradabad. This was the first society for the young people of our church in India and speedily proved that it had come to the Kingdom at the right time. The year following, when the Epworth League was organized in America at Cleveland, Ohio, the Oxford League of India swung into line and became the first foreign branch of the Epworth League.

The need for a Christian young people's society was strongly felt and very soon the League idea spread all over India. In 1894, the Central Conference inaugurated the first Epworth League Board of Control for Southern Asia with Dr. Parker as its president, and Homer C. Stuntz, now bishop, as its secretary.

In 1896 there were 139 chapters with 6,555 members. In 1921, 911 chapters have 24,839 members.

At the present rate of growth there should be 1,000 chapters and 40,000 members in the near future. This is the objective of the board for Southern Asia.

Present work.—Sixty-eight of the districts are organized. Epworth League work is being carried on in nine languages, chiefly through the weekly devotional meetings. Twelve institutes were held in 1921. The Year Book for India contains material for the devotional meetings and some departmental suggestions. An Indian translation of John Wesley, Jr., an introduction to the benevolences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is being prepared. Other literature is published but the supply is very meager.

An extensive social survey has been conducted in Jubbulpore by Epworthians, with plans under way to promote similar studies in other cities.

Needs.—This present program needs to be strengthened and expanded. Forty per cent of the church membership of India is of League age. That there is opportunity and need for great expansion is shown by the following tables:

Percentage of Church Membership actually belonging to the Epworth League.

Conference	Percentage
Central Provinces	22
Burma	20
Bombay	18
Bengal	15
Lucknow	08
North India	05
South India	03
Northwest India	03

Some of the outstanding needs are:

1. Institutes.—The first need of the Epworth League in India is the training of its young people. This can be accomplished most effectively by Institutes. These should be held at least in every district and in co-operation with the larger schools. Through institutes, the program of the Epworth League would be promoted more effectively than in any other way.

2. The Village League.—There is a great field for the Village League in mass movement areas where there is need of a program to hold the young people. The Village League must offer activities covering more than the weekly devotional meeting. India is well supplied with meetings of that type and the Indian is all too well trained in the art of "sitting in meeting" and giving outward attention. The program must include provision for adequate social and recreational life, and it must help in the solution of the problem of illiteracy which influences all departments of church work and which church leaders feel should be solved by the Epworth League.

The Junior League must be built up in the villages for its splendid graded program is adapted to the development of the boys and girls and will insure a trained, informed church membership for the future.

This village program should be undertaken by someone who knows the problems of the village and has ability to carry on the recreational and social phases of the work.

3. Literature.—Through the use of literature, the Epworth League in India will find its greatest opportunity. To meet adequately this situation, the League will have to enter several fields which may seem strange to young people's leaders in the United States, where we have a background of religious publications, public libraries, a progressive school system, magazines written especially for young people, text books, educational motion pictures and a wide-spread and varied educational work on the part of the Government in connection with wireless, corn contests, bird study, etc. All of these produce a more vital type of boy and girl on which foundation more distinctive League work can be done. In India there is practically nothing. They have none of these conditions and privileges with which to work.

A report of the League Secretary for Southern Asia says, in part, that the young people of India are satiated with things religious. In dealing with them too much reliance has been placed upon the natural religiousness of the East. The East is religious in the sense that it is easy to get up a religious discussion and that religion plays a greater part in every-day life than it does with us, but there is very little evidence that religion controls active life and service. It is the dynamic, the active-service type of Christianity that we need to develop, for there is already too much of the passive, formal kind.

Ways must be found to put young India's religious tendencies to work. Hence, some of the needs, in the field of literature are as follows:

1. Text books

Out of the urgent needs, the most imperative ones are at least one text book each in Bible study, life service, missions, Methodism, social service, temperance, the Indian church, health, recreation.

It is important to remember that every book that is issued means eight other books, because of different languages, if we are to cover the whole field. To get the material of one hundred pages into circulation, nine hundred pages must be issued. Only very small editions are practicable which means that there can be no financial gain in publishing them for there will be the full original cost in each instance. Thus the literature problem, great enough already because of the dearth of books, is further complicated by the nine-fold cost of supplying even one item of the need.

2. Leaflets

A series of brief vocational pamphlets would fill a much neglected need. There should be prepared also, a series of leaflets on "hobbies." The young person of India is very inadequately supplied with outside interests. Something must be put into mind and heart to occupy leisure moments.

3. Other publications

Some means of direct contact with the members themselves is necessary. The Indian Witness, the only means available at present, despite the fact that its co-operation is greatly appreciated, reaches practically none of the League clientele. Even with missionaries, the League gets overshadowed by other duties, so that its special interests are not served satisfactorily. It needs a periodical publication of its own for its own crowd.

A plan which would be productive of great results would be to buy space regularly in the vernacular papers in which would be printed evangelistic messages, social service suggestions, and other League material.

4. Stereopticon lectures

At least two sets of slides on Methodism would be of great and needed service for the institute and convention programs. Other lectures on temperance, health, and social service are urgently requested.

5. Additional workers for India

The carrying out of this program will necessitate additions to the Epworth League staff of India of a secretary for the Junior League, a director for the village programs and Indian field secretaries.

7. MEXICO

The Epworth League work and program in Mexico has made rapid progress under the leadership of the Epworth League Secretary for that country.

Needs.—A survey shows that the chief needs are those of organization and standardization. A great deal of League literature is available in Spanish, organizational material, the departmental literature, and helps of various kinds.

The present program.—Two institutes have been held, each with an enrolment of about one hundred.

The Junior work in Mexico is one of the strongest phases of the League program. Five books from the Junior Course of Study have been translated into Spanish. "Stories of Bible Victories", which is the last book to be translated, is awaiting funds for publication. It is hoped that the Junior League work may gradually develop the proper type of native leadership. In fact, because of local conditions, the Junior course of study is better adapted to the beginnings of the Senior League program in New Mexico.

In the near future, the translation of the Senior and Junior Workers' Quarter-

An Epworth League institute in Mexico

lies may be undertaken in order that the Epworthians may have adequate material for the preparation of their devotional meetings.

The work in Mexico is exceedingly encouraging because Mexican Epworthians are undertaking to pull their share of the load by the adoption of the Twenty-four-Hour-Day plan, thus providing not only for their own support, but giving their aid to the work of the general organization.

While the field in Mexico is great and the needs are many, it is believed that the present assistance from outside sources will be sufficient when the Mexican chapters are awake to their full responsibility.

8. SOUTH AMERICA

The present program.—The center of Epworth League work in South America is Concepcion, Chile, where the secretary, Scott P. Hauser, has offices. There are thriving chapters in Panama, Peru, Chile, Argentina, Uruguay and Bolivia.

One institute at Angol, Chile, has been held three years and is remarkable for the success achieved in spite of the lack of equipment.

Bible study is being introduced through the first department. Through gospel teams, chapters conduct evangelistic services which are productive of great results.

Junior chapters make an important contribution to the work.

Needs.—The first item is the salary of a secretary. Instead of the present provision for only part time service, there must be funds for full time work. Amounts are needed for the printing of the Quarterly and other helps, for the service of at least one Spanish pastor, and for establishing and conducting four institutes.

If we had the needed help, we could have an active useful League in every church, make the League a power, and train a more intelligent leadership for the church of to-morrow, which would eventually make the church in South America self-propagating, self-supporting and self-directing.

The challenge of the future.—South America is the land of the future. With its vast resources, waiting to be utilized, its huge expanses waiting to be settled, and above all, its hordes of peoples, ancient and new, waiting to be led up into civilization, it offers a challenge which cannot go unanswered.

9. EUROPE AS A WHOLE

A study of the fields of Europe indicates that there are three types of fields needing our attention;

1. Countries requiring cultivation, where no League work has been done and where the need is urgent.

2. Countries requiring organization where there are many isolated chapters at work without any co-ordinating program.

3. Countries requiring adaptation, where the League is at work in an organized way but where the program should be related more specifically to that of the general organization.

10. ITALY

A ripe field.—There is very little League work in Italy. It is one of the fields needing cultivation; and because of the recent significant political upheaval, the time is undoubtedly right for the launching of a young people's program.

Those conversant with the situation say that no country will respond more heartily than Italy if the opportunity is offered.

The leaders are asking for translation of helps and text-books and for assistance in leadership.

11. FRANCE

A national need.—At present there is almost no Epworth League work in France, due to the old rigid social customs that did not permit the mingling of young people. Gradually, these customs are beginning to change so that there is well-founded hope for a new social regime.

A national need of France is for self-governing, self-expressing groups of young people who will undertake to develop initiative.

The Epworth League has proved its power to fill such a need and is waiting for the opportunity to help the youth of France discover what possibilities lie before them. Those familiar with the situation say that not only would the Methodist Church be served, but that one of the weak spots of France would be strengthened if "Young People's Work for Young People" could be made a reality through the Epworth League's program in France.

Moises Garcia one year later, after a year in a mission school

The immediate appointment of a secretary is urged by Bishop Blake, and a second worker will be needed in the very near future, if the program develops as rapidly as there is every indication it will do.

Some literature, revised to meet the need of the country, has been translated, but more will be needed if the work is to go forward as it should.

12. SCANDINAVIA

The League program is already well developed in Sweden, Finland, Norway, and Denmark. The results which have already been achieved in departmental activities prove that Scandinavian Epworthians are a group of interested and industrious Christian workers. Norway Leagues established summer camps for orphan children of Austria after the World War. Leagues of Denmark support a business college for their share of public improvement. Other activities engage the attention of these wide-awake alert young people.

Needs.—The assistance that we are asked to give is an adequate supply of our League literature which they will then translate and adapt to the needs of their young people. There is an urgent request for the help of a secretary, since the work should be correlated and standardized to a greater extent than has been possible heretofore.

An adequate supply of books and pamphlets must be secured for these fields if the aspirations and the initial impulse are to be effectively utilized for the evangelization of the world.

13. AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY

A most needy field.—From a material standpoint, the young people of Austria and Hungary are very unfortunate. The aftermath of the World War is characterized by severe suffering and privation. In spite of all the hardships they have had to undergo, the young people of these countries are not discouraged, and are only awaiting the help in the way of equipment and leadership, which is so sadly needed. Already the cause of temperance is enthusiastically supported and evangelism shows signs of great promise.

It must be remembered that religious freedom is only two years old in Austria. Until 1920, such advances as are now being made in the Protestant Church were absolutely impossible because of the intolerance of the Roman Catholic Church.

The feeling of international fellowship between the young people of the United States and Austria, has been materially strengthened in the last year by reason of the Sunday Fellowship Hours which have been provided by Epworthians of America for their comrades in Vienna who during the past few years have been too poverty stricken to provide even for their own necessities.

14. SWITZERLAND

The work in Switzerland is characterized by high enthusiasm. A conference-wide organization makes possible something of a standard program.

In 1921, a supply of the material most adapted to their needs was sent and the reports indicated that it was exceedingly useful, but that in planning their activities some assistance should be given them in the preparation of books, methods, and outlines. A secretary is urgently requested.

15. GERMANY

The critical aspect of Germany's situation can hardly be over-emphasized. The young people are exhibiting a willingness to accept the broad principles of the teachings of Jesus Christ.

The denial of their needs would be disastrous to the new League life which has come into being. There is a great demand for all kinds of free literature, books, helps for every department, and institute programs.

German young people have signified their desire to work more and more toward a standardized program. They tell us that religious work for young people has been a long-standing need. The young people themselves desire to advance the spiritual life, to awaken missionary interest, to practice welfare work, and to foster ennobling social life.

The Junior League, which would fill a great place in the program of the Church, is being started with enthusiasm.

One Epworth League institute has already been held and the plans call for an extension of the institute program. The appointing of a German secretary for the Epworth League is sure to mean that for young people's work, so long neglected, new ideals are not far distant.

16. TUNIS

One of the most unusual chapters of the Epworth League is to be found in Tunis. It is three years of age and consists of 110 members, active and associate. The work carried out by each of the departments shows something of the spirit of the Epworthians.

First Department.—The First Department conducted studies on The Life of Christ and is planning in 1923 to observe Win-My-Chum week.

Second Department.—The Second Department offers a program on the second Tuesday of each month, presenting the work in other foreign lands, or a series of studies on church projects in Africa.

Third Department.—The Third Department interests the chapter through moving pictures and illustrated lectures, in the "Anti-Alcohol Ligue." It is co-operating in community life in a splendid way. Part of the money raised by the Russian Branch of the American Red Cross was distributed by the Epworth League. Other assistance has been given the Russian refugees. The Social Service Department visits hospitals and American ships in port, often with a phonograph and records in four languages. It is undoubtedly through the department of recreational culture that the League first attracted the majority of its members. It is the leader in the forming of a six-club organization with baseball teams.

Fourth Department.—Another avenue of approach under the auspices of the League, is the free moving picture. The fourth department is seconding the efforts of the French National Movement to eradicate impure films and literature.

Plans for 1923 call for the formation of one Junior League for the Italian children, another for promising Arab boys; the organization of a group of boy scouts under the leadership of the League and a group of camp-fire girls.

Needs.—There is just one handicap, the lack of literature in Italian and French.

I. HISTORICAL RELATION OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH TO THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY

Adoption of American Bible Society.—In 1836 the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church dissolved its own Bible Society and adopted the American Bible Society as its official organization for the translation and circulation of the Scriptures. Each succeeding General Conference has continued this relationship and recognizes the American Bible Society as one of the official benevolences of the church.

Comparison of gifts.—A few facts concerning the gifts of the church at different periods will be of interest and are of importance. They are taken at random from a study of the entire record of the gifts of the Methodist Episcopal Church to the American Bible Society as related to its other benevolent gifts and to its membership.

In 1853 the gifts from the Methodist Episcopal Church were at the rate of .046 per member or $34,339. In 1865 they were at the rate of .109 per member or $101,743. In 1922 they were at the rate of .033 per member or $150,000.

If the Methodist Episcopal Church were to give in 1923 at the same rate per member as it did in 1853 (which was a wholly normal period), it would give to the Society a total of $203,065. If it were to give in 1923 at the same rate per member as it did in 1865, it would give a total of $481,177.

If we compare the gifts of the Methodist Episcopal Church to the American Bible Society and its missionary collections, one or two interesting facts appear. For instance, in 1856, the collections for missions amounted to $200,970 and for the American Bible Society $35,038 or over seventeen per cent. If the church were giving to the American Bible Society seventeen per cent of its collections for Home and Foreign Missionary Societies today it would be giving over $1,700,000 instead of $150,000. In 1866, the collections for missions amounted to $671,000 and the collections for the American Bible Society were $107,238, or about one-sixth. If the Society were receiving today one-sixth of the offerings of the Missionary Societies it would receive over $1,500,000. This was a particularly good year for the Bible Society. For years during that period it was the only other benevolence of the church, then came along other collections. In 1886 the Missionary Societies received $823,056 and the American Bible Society $28,940, or a little more than one-fortieth. If the society were receiving today one-fortieth of the collections of the Missionary Societies, it would receive $250,000 a year. In 1906 before the separation into Boards of Home and Foreign Missions, the total collection for missions was $1,841,511 and the gifts for the Bible Society were $40,074 or about one forty-fourth. If the Society were to receive one forty-fourth of what is now given to the Home and Foreign Missionary Societies, it would still receive over $200,000 a year.

Ought the church ever to forget that the Bible Society stands next to home and foreign missions in the history of its benevolent program?

II. INFLUENCE OF THE ACTION OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH ON OTHER DE- NOMINATIONS

Other denominations follow Methodist example.—The intelligent and generous support given to the Bible cause by the recognition of the American Bible Society among its official benevolences and the inclusion of the same in its budget has led many other denominations to follow the example of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, which was united with the Methodist Episcopal Church when the American Bible Society was made an official benevolence has continued the same generous interest in the American Bible Society.

Within recent years the leading denominations of the United States have entered into the same relationships so that at the present time there are fifteen denominations which have adopted the American Bible Society as their official medium for the translation, publication, and circulation of the Holy Scriptures. Many of these denominations are emulating the generous support given the Society by the Methodist Episcopal Church and a few of them are exceeding it in the fixed percentage which they have adopted for the Society in their budgets.

The colporteur takes the Bible to the Negro's home

III. WHAT ARE THE NEEDS?

1. IN THE HOMELAND

a. Work among the Negroes of the United States.—It has been found necessary to create a special department to meet this problem and the American Bible Society has taken it up in earnest with a secretary in charge, located in the Bible House, New York, and four sub-agents at Atlanta, Georgia; Charlotte, North Carolina; Memphis, Tennessee; and Houston, Texas, to provide for the 10,000,000 colored people scattered throughout the Southern States. Out from these centers are operating twenty-five full-time colporteurs and a large force of volunteer workers and special part-time colporteurs.

Taking cognizance of the tide of immigration whereby nearly 1,000,000 Negroes have moved into the North during the last five years, a fifth sub-agency has been established in Cleveland, Ohio, and efforts are being made to follow up the emigrants, as they have largely settled in industrial centers and in the large cities of the North. This today is one of the big problems confronting the American Bible Society and demanding its most careful attention.

There is an imperative need for other sub-agencies, especially in Greater New York, Chicago, and Los Angeles. Only shortage of funds delays the putting into effect of these plans.

b. The Eastern Agency.—This includes the State of New York, together with adjacent portions of the New England States not included in the territory of auxiliary societies.

The headquarters of this agency are in the Bible House, New York City, and are in charge of the local sales room.

Although one of the smallest agencies as to area, it is one of the most complex in its problems.

c. The Atlantic Agency.—The Atlantic Agency covers Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware. The great problems in this agency are connected with the vast industries and mining populations in which there are large numbers of foreign-speaking peoples.

We believe in Americanizing by Bible-izing. By the use of Diglots (English and foreign language Scriptures in parallel columns, which are now available in thirty-three different languages) the users learn the Bible while learning English.

A colporteur among miners, Pennsylvania

We co-operate with mission churches and workers to supply each church and Sunday school with Bibles and to provide colporteurs for language groups.

d. South Atlantic Agency.—This Agency with headquarters at Richmond, Virginia, includes the states of Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida.

There are 8,000 churches in this territory, but very few adequately supplied with Scriptures.

A reasonable estimate is that there are 150,000 families without Bibles in this territory.

With but very few exceptions the public schools throughout this entire area are open to the distribution of the Scriptures. A program whereby a portion might be placed in the hands of each child will be welcomed.

About 40 nationalities are represented in the population of this Agency. The larger groups are found in the mining and lumber sections of West Virginia and North Carolina and in the industrial centers like Norfolk, Virginia, and Atlanta, Georgia. The very difficulties of overcoming fanaticism, ignorance and superstition in these varied nationalities is a challenge to the Christian church.

e. Central Agency.—This Agency with headquarters at Cincinnati, Ohio, includes the states of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Alabama.

f. Northwestern Agency.—This large agency includes the nine states of Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Michigan. It contains a total population of 23,087,086, this being a growth of twenty per cent in the last ten years.

One striking feature has been the phenomenal growth of the cities during this time, being far in excess of the growth of the evangelical churches, thus throwing an unusually heavy responsibility upon the Bible Society.

In the rapid increase of population the element of foreign or mixed parentage has centralized in the cities, and these recruits have come almost exclusively from the southern and southeastern parts of Europe—non-Bible-using people.

Depositories of Scriptures must be established in available centers of population.

Colporteurs must be provided for nationalities—Italians, Bohemians, Poles, Slovaks, Roumanians, Jews, Russians, Bulgarians, and others.

Voluntary workers must be sought and their efforts directed.

g. Southwestern Agency.—This agency with its headquarters at Dallas, Texas, includes the states of Texas, Oklahoma, Louisiana, and Arkansas, with a total population of 10,342,224.

This territory faces certain problems peculiar to itself. Within the last five years hundreds of thousands of Mexicans have crossed the border into the United States, a large proportion of them either locating in or passing through the state of Texas. These people are nominally Roman Catholics, but few if any of them have ever so much as seen a copy of the Bible. A strenuous effort is being made to supply each one, so far as possible, with a copy of the Scriptures. Two Mexican colporteurs are giving all their time, visiting the towns along the border where these refugees congregate.

Another feature of this area is the French and Creole population of Louisiana, centering in and about New Orleans. This has long been a stronghold of Roman Catholicism and a very difficult place for Bible distribution, but within the last few years a great change has taken place here in this respect and our veteran colporteur now at work in New Orleans is receiving a wonderful welcome and reports that never before has he found any city more open to the Scriptures.

Another problem is the sparsely settled population of Arkansas. Many of these people are removed from school or church influences and unless reached by the distributor of the Word are untouched by religious influences.

h. Western Agency. — This agency, with headquarters in Denver, Colorado, includes the states of Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Utah, Wyoming, New Mexico, and Arizona, with a total population of 8,432,006.

This is an area of immense distances. It would take the Secretary four years of constant travel, spending one day in a town, to cover the territory and then there would be numerous hamlets yet untouched.

Needs:

Depositories conveniently located;

Co-operation with home mission workers;

Colporteurs for nationalities;

Volunteer workers.

i. Pacific Agency. — This agency with headquarters at San Francisco, California, includes the states of Washington, Oregon, Nevada, and California, with a total population of 5,644,278, calling for Scriptures last year in the following languages:

This territory possesses probably the greatest number of sects, beliefs, and "isms" of any part of the United States, emphasizing the supreme necessity for a strong centrally organized Bible work throughout the section. It is the only basis on which these divergencies can be brought together.

2. IN FOREIGN FIELDS

a. The West Indies Agency.—With headquarters in San Juan, Porto Rico, this agency includes the West Indian group of islands, with a total population of 10,500,000. Of these about two-thirds are white and one-third colored. There are hundreds of islands in this group, widely scattered. With inadequate missionary work among all these islands as compared with other foreign lands, it leaves a heavy responsibility upon the Bible Society. With but six sub-agents and nineteen colporteurs largely self-sustaining at other tasks and giving but little of their time to the work, the task is far from being completed. It would require a number of depositories and at least fifty colporteurs adequately to cover this territory.

b. The Mexico Agency.—This agency, with headquarters in Mexico City, covers the entire Republic of Mexico with a population of 15,500,000. Former antagonism to the Bible so prevalent in Mexico has largely diminished and the work of the Bible Society is the one foreign propaganda that is meeting with rapidly growing favor throughout this new republic. In order to cover this territory the number of colporteurs should be greatly increased.

c. The Caribbean Agency.—The headquarters of this agency are in Cristobal. It includes all the republics of Central America, Panama, and the Canal Zone, extending its work into Colombia, and containing a total population of about 10,000,000.

Inadequate transportation facilities in this large territory make this an unusually difficult field, and the Bible Society's colporteur is in many instances the sole representative of evangelical Christianity to penetrate these distances.

d. The Upper Andes Agency.—Its headquarters office is in the Panama Canal Zone. It extends its operations throughout parts of Colombia, Ecuador, Peru and Bolivia. It contains a total population of about 13,905,172. This field is coming rapidly into prominence and there is an extremely urgent need for more aggressive Bible propaganda, propaganda which would employ at least twenty colporteurs.

e. The Brazil Agency.—

With headquarters in Rio Janeiro, this agency includes the Republic of Brazil, and contains a population of 22,000,000. The present appropriation provides for about seven colporteurs in this vast territory which is so rapidly being filled up and developed. In order to keep pace with the growth, there should be two or three times that number, and a greatly enlarged supply of Bibles.

f. The La Plata Agency.—With headquarters in Buenos Aires, this agency includes the Republics of South America excepting Brazil, in which the Spanish language prevails: Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Chile, with a total population of 14,704,282.

The veteran representative of the American Bible Society, in charge of this agency for many years, the Rev. F. G. Penzotti, has done more than any other person to popularize the Bible in the fastnesses of this great continent. His son now follows in charge of the work and after a careful study of the field estimates that he should have at least seventy-five full time co-workers in order to meet the needs.

As one writes, "A great change has taken place in the Republic of Argentina during the last decade in the reception of the Scriptures by the Republic." The Bible is a mighty leaven.

g. The Levant Agency.—This agency has its headquarters in Constantinople. Its territory includes the Turkish Empire in Europe and Asia.

Here we have the storm center of the world as these 51,000,000 of people are torn by the distresses of fanatical warfare.

First, the Ottomans themselves must have their individual as well as national life leavened by a much larger introduction of the Scriptures if they are ever to be able to take their place at the council table of the Christian nations.

Second, the hundreds of thousands of persecuted Christians who have lost all and are being persecuted even to death are calling upon the Bible Society as never before for the Sacred Word.

h. The Arabic-Levant Agency.—This agency has its headquarters at Cairo, Egypt. It is a natural product in the development of the Levant Agency, which outgrew the possibility of direction from one central office. This includes Egypt, Palestine, and Syria, containing a total population of about 22,650,000. Much of this is entirely untouched by evangelical mission work. Thousands do not have the Bible and the Bible Society should have at least seventy-five representatives and increased stocks of books to meet this situation.

i. The Siam Agency.—With headquarters in Bangkok, this agency includes a population of about 10,000,000 people. This is a country of vast morasses and wildernesses, and a dense population reaching far off into Southwestern China, with poor transportation facilities demanding arduous labors on the part of those who carry the Word. Last year there were about thirty-five workers engaged in this agency, giving all or part of their time. There should be at least three times as many and a greatly enlarged publication program.

j. The China Agency.—Its headquarters are in Shanghai. By mutual arrangement with other Societies the American Bible Society has accepted the responsibility for supplying the Scriptures to about 150,000,000 Chinese. Five sub-agencies are located at strategic centers, Peking, Hankow, Canton, Chungking, and Chengtu. Most of the work is being done by voluntary workers, which at best is only sporadic and somewhat indefinite. A careful estimate of the workers needed for this territory calls for at least seven hundred and fifty full time workers.

k. The Philippine Agency.—Its headquarters are in Manila. It has the entire responsibility of providing the Scriptures for the total population of the Islands, about 11,000,000 people. By an interchange with the British and Foreign Bible Society they have withdrawn from the Philippines so that the whole work of translation, revision, publication, and distribution depends upon the American Bible Society. This work largely beginning in Spanish and now growing in English, covers also ten Philippine dialects.

l. The Japan Agency.—The headquarters of the Japanese Agency are in Tokyo. From there, the American Bible Society caters to the northern half of the Japanese Empire containing about 30,000,000 of people. The Bible Society's representative enjoys a peculiar immunity from the prejudice which the Japanese have against the representatives of the foreign institution or mission seeking establishment in their Empire. It comes not to receive, but to give, and as such has a large place in the hearts of the people. The Bible has had and is having a very large place in the formation of the new character of the Japanese people. In order to reach the last man within a reasonable time they should have at least one hundred and fifty paid workers in this area, giving their whole time.

m. Other Fields.—In addition to these established agencies, the Society endeavors to meet calls for Scriptures and for funds to assist in the circulation of the Scriptures in every country in Europe except Great Britain and in fields in Africa, and Asia, and the Islands of the South Seas not covered by the regular agencies.

IV. A TEN-YEAR PROGRAM

FORECAST

The Society has been asked to look ahead for a period of ten years and present some statements concerning the real need for the expansion of its work. Its officers have gone very carefully into this matter and have accumulated a very considerable amount of important and valuable data. It is not yet in final form. From it, however, certain facts emerge.

If the Society is to live up to its motto "The Whole Bible for the Whole World" it should at once begin on a greatly enlarged program which would include:

a. An enlargement of its literary department for a study of the language needs of each group and of the scholarship at home and in mission lands available to serve on Committees of Translation and Revision.

b. A very notable increase in its publication activities which would involve the employment of many publication houses not now engaged in this work or the setting up of manufacturing plants in regions where no such facilities exist.

c. A proper housing of its work in all the centers in the world in which it operates. It has now a Bible House in New York, a Bible House in Cristobal, and one in Manila. It has certain relationships to the Bible House in Constantinople. It has land in Peking and in Canton on which Bible Houses should at once be erected. If this program of building were carried out, as it should be, it would involve large expenditures but a great saving would be accomplished in the end.

d. Such an addition to its agencies at home and abroad as to cover adequately every state in the Union and the foreign lands in which in spite of all that is being done the surface is only being touched here and there. This would mean enlargement of its staff abroad and the employment of the peculiar messengers of the Bible Societies, "The Colporteurs," in greatly increased numbers, and the proper supervision of their activities.

Of course all such enlargement would involve a proportionate development of the executive organization.

A somewhat detailed estimate of a minimum annual expenditure of a ten years' adequate program follows.

It may not be wise in this survey to suggest the share of the Methodist Episcopal Church in such a program, but it would necessarily have to be on a scale proportionate to the increase for other official benevolences.

A CONVERTED BARROOM

We are not seeking simply to make a safe place for ourselves and our children in the United States. . . . We did not help to drive the saloon out of America expecting it to take up its abode in China or Africa or anywhere else, unopposed. Wherever the liquor infamy exists, we are set to fight it.

Captured at Washington, D. C.

1. HISTORICAL STATEMENT

The temperance society.—The Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals, with offices at Washington, District of Columbia, organized by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church and incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia, is the outgrowth of the permanent Committee on Temperance and Prohibition established by the General Conference of 1888. The General Conference of 1904, meeting in Los Angeles, broadened the work of this committee and changed its name to the Temperance Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and made it one of the benevolences with headquarters at Chicago.

At the General Conference of 1908 in Baltimore, the constitution of the society was broadened and $25,000 was apportioned for its support and every pastor was requested to present the claims of the society and ask a free-will offering of the people.¹

The Board of Managers met semi-annually in Chicago to raise financial aid for any places where there was a call of need. When Oklahoma was having her fight for state-wide prohibition, the society raised funds and sent speakers. Besides, numerous leaflets and pamphlets were sent broadcast into the country, effectually supplementing public meetings.

In 1910, the Board of Managers elected two men to devote their full time to the Board of Temperance. These men entered upon their work without office, desk, or salary and without guarantee of expense by anyone, but the church rallied to the work. Literature by the hundreds of thousands of pages was circulated, especially during wet and dry contests.

An important pledge campaign was conducted; speeches were made on street corners, in parks and in locations of almost every description in thirty-four states. When the General Conference of 1912 met it was found that more than one hundred thousand people had been pledged to abstinence.

By a unanimous vote, the General Conference of 1912 commended the administration of the board, moved its headquarters to Topeka, Kansas, and voted a $50,000 apportionment as a minimum for its support.² During the next four years the society participated in twenty-seven state campaigns and sent out millions of pages of literature. The work was divided into departments and under-secretaries were named. Research and publicity began to be undertaken; posters were produced; automobile campaigns in the neglected portions of states facing prohibition elections were conducted and several of these campaigns were decided by the work of the board.

In 1916, the General Conference unanimously increased the board's apportionment, re-wrote its constitution to broaden its field of operation and to make permanent its task, located it at Washington, District of Columbia, and instructed it to undertake a building operation.¹

Present objectives of the board.—The General Conference of 1920 took the following action:²

"In order to make more effectual the efforts of the church to create a Christian public sentiment, which will relate the principles of the gospel of Christ to the economical, political, industrial, and social relations of life, and which will crystallize opposition to all public violations of the moral law, the General Conference hereby authorizes the organization of a Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with headquarters at Washington, District of Columbia, and the Board shall incorporate under this title and work under the following condition:

"The object of this Board is to promote voluntary total abstinence from all intoxicants and narcotics, to enforce existing statutory laws and constitutional provisions that suppress the liquor traffic and to secure the speedy enactment of such legislation throughout the world."

"It shall be the duty of the Board of Managers to represent the church officially in every wise movement for the promotion of voluntary personal total abstinence and the securing of legal prohibition of the liquor traffic; to promote public morals; to publish, approve and distribute literature on the liquor traffic, the use of narcotics and manufactured articles containing a large per cent of alcoholic liquors; to devise such plans and make such advices as shall enable the church most successfully to compass the overthrow of that great foe of society, the legalized liquor traffic; to make such use of the money paid into its treasury as the work demands, and to publish an annual report of its work and to make a quadrennial report to the General Conference."

II. THE PRESENT WORK OF THE BOARD

1. CO-OPERATIVE RELATIONS

It is notable that from the beginning, the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals has had only the most pleasant relations with the Anti-Saloon League, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and other temperance and reform organizations. This is due to the fact that its field has been unique and its methods have been unprecedented. It has gone into the highway and byways. It has circulated literature where literature was not previously being circulated. It has sent its speakers where temperance speakers were hitherto unknown.

2. THE STAFF

At present the board has a general secretary, a research secretary, two field secretaries, two extension secretaries, a secretary for Colored work, and assistants in research, publicity, and office management.

There are foreign secretaries in South America, France, Japan, India, Italy, Austria, Hungary, Switzerland, Germany, the Baltic States, and Mexico.

3. CONTACTS WITH THE FIELD

a. Public presentations.—During the year 1922, the general secretary and his assistants travelled many thousands of miles representing the board at important conferences, conventions, before committees of Congress and on many other occasions. They have also participated in Epworth League Institutes, Sunday-school conventions and public mass meetings. The board has done vital work in cleaning up the Mexican border and in investigations at various points in the United States, although it does not undertake what is ordinarily known as "law enforcement" work. The secretary for Colored work organized and managed a law enforcement conference at Nashville, Tennessee, with from seven to eight hundred colored delegates. Leaflets were circulated in great quantities.

b. The "Clipsheet."—A Clipsheet has been published and circulated which goes to every daily newspaper in the United States and to thousands of other publications, as well as to hundreds of "key men" here and abroad. The idea of this publication was born in a conviction that the methods of circulating prohibition literature were inadequate. Prohibition papers were being sent to people who subscribed for them, just as speaking was being done to those who were already convinced. It was believed that literature should be constantly and systematically placed in the hands of men and women whose opinions were worth while, but who had not been sufficiently interested in prohibition to pay for a prohibition paper. The Clipsheet is in a sense a literary street speaker, being sent out not primarily as a publicity attempt, but as an earnest, honest, above-board pleader for civic righteousness. It was a pioneer and today its influence for good is tremendous and it is imitated in the interests of a hundred other causes. It has stood for prohibition, for political cleanliness, for Americanism pure and undefiled and against Sabbath desecration, brutal prizefighting and gambling. It has avoided fanaticism and extremism, but has been loyal and fearless.

c. "The Voice."—Similarly, The Voice goes to our preachers. It is brief, quickly read and hides nothing from our people.

d. Educational publicity.—During 1922, we issued a number of special publications, some of which were widely circulated. Particular attention was paid to illustrations, for instance, in the report of the effects of prohibition in the city of Chicago.

In 1921, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, requested that the board undertake an investigation as to the present attitude of business men on American prohibition. This was arranged with The Manufacturers' Record of Baltimore, and the publication has been circulated in almost every country.

Frequently, instead of the board's having to go to the newspapers with material, their men come to its offices seeking news. The board has an effective and systematic news-gathering service. At the prohibition commissioner's office in Washington, there is a special hook on which matters that might be of interest to it are hung and are available for collection every day. Our friends in Congress and in the departments and frequently newspaper men are sources of information. During the past year various new avenues of publicity have been located.

The board constantly is checking up on liquor hoaxes and found a peculiar pleasure during 1922 in correcting once again the perennial liquor hoax as to Abraham Lincoln. Scores of liquor law violations have been reported.

e. Research and reference.—A vast deal of new statistical information has been collected and classified. Files and card systems are in good condition. The board has information, for instance, showing the wet or dry prejudices, the religious affiliations and general character of nearly all members of Congress. It is now collecting police statistics from every city in the United States having a population of more than 25,000. Many methods are used, direct inquiry, inquiry by congressmen, visitation, and local representations. Through our congressional friends, the Library of Congress has been used effectively, matter being frequently translated and information compiled and reported. The general information files are depended upon to some extent by representatives, senators, newspaper men, magazine writers, pastors and the general public, including debaters, schools, public libraries, etc. Prohibition material in the magazines, the Advocates, prohibition publications, the Clipsheet and The Voice is indexed and filed. For propaganda use, a list of newspapers having columns devoted to contributions is being made. The board is now locating and photographing closed Keeley and Neal institutes, closed jails and breweries which are used for other purposes. This material will be used for illustrated publications and slides.

f. Charts and cartoons. — The board also makes and circulates charts, illustrations, cartoons, maps and posters, which are furnished for exhibits and other uses. Efforts are being made to appeal especially to young people.

g. Lectures and film. — Stereopticon lectures have been circulated and the board's motion picture has been exhibited to many thousands of people. In one New Jersey city, it was shown to various groups of foreign born and at the night school it was made the subject of an essay contest. Additional illustrated lectures to cover temperance and the general work of the board are being prepared.

Mute evidence that Chile needs the services of this board

The board's offices have been general headquarters for foreign visitors. From all parts of the world they have come, some of them bearing ornate commissions from their governments to study American prohibition.

4. FOREIGN WORK

a. Europe.—The board sent one of its secretaries abroad in 1919 and again in 1921 to outline and establish the European work. The second time he went by appointment of the President of the United States. It has personal acquaintance with every prohibition leader in Europe. Co-operating faithfully with the leaders of our church, the board is responsible for a most flourishing Methodist temperance movement abroad. At present it is firmly established in twenty-one nations. The abnormal power of the gold dollar is enabling it to do a work abroad which could not be done in normal times for less than half a million dollars.

In France, two representatives have lectured, given motion picture exhibitions against alcohol, visited schools, colleges, barracks and Boy Scout organizations. Real missionary work has also been done in taking the gospel of temperance to the slums. Argument and appeal have been taken to large manufacturers, false statements in the newspapers have been denied and public demonstrations in the city streets have been held.

In Italy, under the Italian secretary, educational and publicity work has been launched, a paper is being published, and meetings have been held in public places, prisons, schools and colleges.

In Switzerland, a well-balanced work in the Methodist Church is under way. A paper is published, effective work is being done among young people and much public propaganda is going on. The board contributes sixty per cent of the income of the International Temperance Bureau under Dr. Hercod, the leader of European temperance propaganda. The director of the Swiss telegraph agency has agreed to transmit press news, as have the Havas (French), Wolfe (German), Reuter (English), and Stefani (Italian) news agencies.

In Austria, Hungary, Germany, Estonia, and Latvia the work is flourishing and in some of these countries it is reaching large proportions. In Moscow and Petrograd there are promising openings. At Augsburg, Mannheim and Buda Pesth, there are fixed centers of propaganda. A connection has been made with the Russian priests looking toward temperance education. In Austria, a student secretary gives his entire time to that work. Special attention has been given to exhibits and parades. The work in Hungary and Czecho-Slovakia is backed by the leading men of the nation. The board has newly established work at Darmstadt and Riga.

b. India.—A very large and promising work has been launched in India. A headquarters is maintained under direction of an executive committee, a monthly Clipsheet is published and many addresses have been made. Testimony has been given before government commissions. A study book has been prepared for the Epworth Leagues and posters have been issued. A great deal of literature in the vernacular is circulated. Several important conventions have been held.

c. Latin America.—In South America important connections have been established with the Chilean government and with influential societies there and in other republics. A news service is conducted. Moving pictures and stereopticons are used. Propaganda is being carried on in mines, shops and factories. The weekly bulletin has a circulation of 1,500.

Arrangements have been made to finance a work in Mexico.

d. Miscellaneous.—Small appropriations were made to assist in the Scandinavian countries and in Korea. In addition to all of this, quantities of literature were sent to various parts of Europe, Asia, and Australasia. The literature circulated by the Research Department would make one solid column 2,000 miles long. The Clipseet has gone to British newspapers and we have received many acknowledgments.

During 1922 three thousand inquiries were answered and large co-operation has been given to other temperance organizations.

III. PLANS FOR THE FUTURE

Wet propaganda. — The prohibition amendment is at present being assailed by every species of misrepresentation. This misrepresentation extends to the history of the movement, the method by which the prohibition amendment was achieved, the motives behind the agitation, and the effects of the policy. Abuse, misstatement of fact, and the powerful influence of suggestion in cartoons, jokes, headlines, and news reports fall before the eyes of millions of people daily. By these methods uninformed or illiterate people, as well as those with criminal tendencies are being made to distrust our form of government, to disapprove the methods outlined by the fathers for the securing of constitutional changes, to despise law and to violate it as a matter of convinced right, not to say of duty. Anti-prohibition propaganda appeals have been made particularly to those of alien birth, to those whose education has been achieved in an alien atmosphere, to shallow-minded, so-called "society people," to Negroes and to other large special classes. Practically all of the foreign-language newspapers in the United States constantly misrepresent the prohibition law, not only opposing it, but advertising materials and methods for violating it. The entire anti-prohibition campaign constitutes a challenge to the safety of America as well as challenge to the integrity of prohibition.

Urgent immediate measures.—The little church on Main Street brought prohibition to the country and it alone can defend it. The claim that prohibition was "put over" on the people, that it is not approved by a majority of the population, and that it is the fruit of fanaticism, is constantly placed before the average man. Unless adequate defensive measures are taken immediately, we face, in plain speaking, the imminent return of the American saloon, which was in fact a beer saloon almost invariably owned or controlled by brewers. We face the return of the beer interest in politics with its alliance with alienism and of every evil thing against which we have fought for a century, together with a new evil in the form of widespread promotion of home drinking by women and children and the bootlegging of whisky at every bar. The Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals knows how to meet this emergency, but it can not meet it with present funds. The question is not one of legislation and the agencies and methods which have achieved the legislation can not deal with it. The only adequate methods call for an early enlargement of its educational propaganda.

The critical situation abroad.—Similarly the work of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals abroad involves such vast opportunities as to call for immediate enlargement. It is not incorrect to say that misrepresentation of American prohibition in the foreign press is amazing in its extent and appalling in its consequences. The Methodist Episcopal Church throughout the world parallels the prohibition movement in the thinking of the people and we can not avoid our peculiar responsibility which, if bravely assumed, promises immense rewards. When one of our bishops met the President of Czecho-Slovakia, the President said, "I am glad to know you or any Methodist; I am a total abstainer myself." What Methodism does for prohibition in Europe will bring hundreds and thousands of thinking patriots to its doors.

Other evil tendencies.—The board's duties do not end with a defense of the prohibition law. It is perfectly apparent that little or nothing is being done to check numerous bad tendencies in American life. It is a fact that there is more gambling today, for instance, than ever before in our history. Something also must be done to encourage decency in the literature of the people, to restrain evil influences which are disintegrating home life and causing young people to despise the moral standards of their fathers. The question of drugs is a world problem which we have not touched.

The board should be enabled to deal more adequately with the question of popular amusements, prize fighting, and with Sabbath desecration. It should be enabled to deal particularly with the question of Americanism. The church can trust its own agency to deal with these problems without fanaticism and with dignity, and it should enable its agency to deal with them vigorously and promptly.

1. THE GENERAL DEACONESS BOARD

OBJECTIVES

"For the promotion of deaconess work throughout the church there shall be a board known as the General Deaconess Board of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This board, duly incorporated under the laws of the State of New York and having its headquarters in the city of Buffalo, shall have general supervision of all deaconess work in the church and control of all the deaconesses."

"The General Deaconess Board, on request of the Conference Deaconess Board and the annual conference, shall have power to authorize the establishment of a deaconess institution. Should the proposed institution be a school, authorization shall be given only after approval by the Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The General Deaconess Board shall satisfy itself that there is need of the proposed institution in the locality designated; that the site selected is suitable for the work intended; that it would not be likely to affect unfavorably any existing institution; that there is good prospect of its adequate support, and that its property, of whatever form, is not unduly encumbered."

"The General Deaconess Board shall establish a standard for entrance into training schools, provided it shall be equivalent to a high-school course, and shall prescribe the Courses of Study for Deaconesses. It shall have authority to determine and settle all questions arising between institutions and individuals. It shall seek to promote general interest in this work, approve rules for the government of both institutions and deaconesses, prescribe a distinctive garb for deaconesses, determine the minimum allowance for active deaconesses, fix amount of pension for retired deaconesses and perform such other service as the work may demand."¹

II. DISTINCTIVE POSITION NOW HELD BY THE DEACONESS

Annual conference membership.—The deaconess has a distinctive position among the women workers of the Methodist Episcopal Church. She is the only woman worker who has membership in an annual conference body; who reports to and has her standing approved by that body; who is appointed to her work by the presiding bishop; who is consecrated by church authorization, and who, when no longer able to continue in effective service, is granted a retired relation with pension.

Scope of deaconess work.—Since the days of the Apostles there have been women, called deaconesses, who have given their lives to the service of the church. The deaconess of the Methodist Episcopal Church is the direct successor of the devoted women whose names are recorded in the pages of the New Testament. However, the service rendered now is broader and much more varied than was that of early years. The Discipline states clearly the wide scope of the work of a deaconess.

"A deaconess is a woman of suitable qualification who has been led by the Holy Spirit to devote herself to Christlike service under the direction of the church. . . . She will give herself to any form of service that will further the kingdom of God."¹

Her distinctive position.—What, then, differentiates the deaconess from other women workers within the church?

Not her work, since she may do any work; not her dress, since the wearing of the distinctive garb is optional with "the form of administration or other organization with which the deaconess serves"; not her remuneration, since that is not now limited. The difference is in her relationship. She is a member of the Deaconess Board of an annual conference and thereby a part of connectional Methodism. From this relationship she can be removed only by resignation, by formal trial, or by death.

III. THE GROWTH OF THE DEACONESS MOVEMENT

The Deaconess Movement in the Methodist Episcopal Church dates officially from 1888. In that year the General Conference gave it recognition. It was in 1890 that the first deaconess license in the United States was granted.

1. GROWTH IN PERSONNEL IN THE UNITED STATES

In 1890 there were 3 deaconesses.

In 1901 there were 318, with 505 probationers.

In 1911 there were 723, with 179 probationers.²

In 1921 there were 846, with 88 probationers.

In 1922 there were 881, with 142 probationers.

In Europe, where the General Deaconess Board has general supervision, the movement has attained great strength. The latest information from Switzerland, Germany, and the Scandinavian countries shows 907 deaconesses in Europe.

This gives a grand total of 1,930 deaconesses and probationers in the United States and Europe, which indicates an average annual increase of 55 since the action of the General Conference of 1888.

² A different method of reckoning probationers accounts for the loss during this decade. In the early years every student in the training schools was reported as a probationer. The time came when this custom ceased and hence the decline in reported probationers.

$ MILLIONS

2. GROWTH IN PROPERTY

Growth since 1894.—The church has gladly placed in the hands of the deaconesses the property needed to carry on their work. These figures show remarkable growth in the institutions that have been officially recognized as deaconess institutions. The first year for which accurate information is available is 1894.

In 1894 the total deaconess property represented a value of $284,908.

In 1902 the property and endowment figures had gone up to $1,898,992.

In 1912 the total was $4,682,343.

In 1922 it had jumped to $12,767,050.

This growth in property gives an annual increase since 1888 of $375,501. If this increase were divided into the period before the organization of the present form of the General Deaconess Board and the period since, it would give the following: Annual increase before 1912, $195,097; annual increase since 1912, $808,470.

These figures do not include the property in Europe. The fluctuating money market makes any calculation unsatisfactory, but reliable estimates value European property at $1,495,669. These figures are conservative, and probably should be half a million dollars higher.

The total of deaconess property in the United States and in Europe is approximately $14,259,719.

IV. PRESENT STATUS OF THE DEACONESS MOVEMENT

New impetus in 1920.—Any program for the Deaconess Movement within the Methodist Episcopal Church must recognize the important status given this Movement by the General Conference of 1920. Too few have adequate conception of the action taken at that time.

The present status of the deaconess is set forth in Chapter Three of Part IV of the Discipline, 1920, ¶ 229-240.

The present status of the deaconess organization is contained in Chapter Fourteen of Part VII of the Discipline, 1920, ¶ 491-499.

These portions of the Discipline call upon the deaconess to carry on "any form of service which will further the kingdom of God."

As a result women of the highest capabilities and training can find within the Deaconess Movement ample scope for their consecrated service. There is no form of work open to women within the church that is not now open to the deaconess.

Types of work.—The Commission on Life Service has recently issued literature showing that deaconesses are now required for the following types of work:

1. Local Church Positions: Pastor's Assistant, Church Secretary, Director of Religious Education, Director of Social and Recreational Activities, Missionary, Evangelistic, Country Church.

2. Social Service Positions: Old People's Homes, Rest Homes, Children's Homes, Orphanages, Baby Folds, Deaconess Homes, Business Girls' and Woman's Homes, Fresh Air and Vacation Homes, Settlements, Day Nurseries, Immigrant Work, Hospitals, Dispensaries, District Nursing.

3. Educational Positions: Grade Schools, Secondary Schools, High Schools,

5. To administer effectively the affairs of the board.

In addition to these five it is the duty of the General Deaconess Board to bring into sympathetic co-operation the deaconess work of the entire Methodist Episcopal Church.

Colleges, Universities, Training Schools, Industrial Schools.

4. General Positions: Executive, Editorial, Administrative.

Additions are bound to be made to this list as new positions open to women workers, and as this is happening constantly, the Deaconess Movement is manifestly just at the beginning of a period of great enlargement.

V. PROGRAM OF ADVANCE

Distinct fields of activity.—In view of the ever-widening field of deaconess service and in order that our board may properly co-ordinate its work with that of other boards of the church, it will be necessary for the General Deaconess Board to devote itself primarily to the promotion of such activities as relate to the advancement of the Deaconess Movement.

The task placed upon the General Deaconess Board is a large one and in order to carry it out adequately, the program divides itself into five distinct fields of activity.

1. To disseminate information about the widening scope of the Deaconess Movement and of the official connectional relation of the deaconess.

2. To secure deaconess candidates sufficient in number and of such quality as to meet the increasing demand.

3. To provide for these candidates the best possible preparation.

4. To make possible proper facilities for those in need of rest and to insure

1. DISSEMINATING INFORMATION

An information service.—There is nothing more certain than that the day of woman's work in the church is here. Women are now serving world-wide church organizations. They are in executive positions, have been members of general conferences, and devote themselves to almost every form of Christian activity. As the Deaconess Movement is a connectional movement of the Church it is the duty of the General Deaconess Board to formulate for the information of the church a program of possible deaconess service. Such a program will demand large use of the church press, will call for specially adapted printed material and will necessitate presentation by pictures and addresses.

2. SECURING CANDIDATES

Life service appeals.—As knowledge of the Deaconess Movement becomes widespread and new enterprises are undertaken, there will be an increasing call to the gifted daughters of the church and many more women of the highest type must be brought into this form of service. Young women in high schools and colleges should be reached with such attractive printed material as will arrest attention. In public gatherings and in private conversation the claims of this work should be personally presented.

In all this work the General Deaconess Board will continue to co-operate with the Life Service Commission.

3. TRAINING CANDIDATES

Adequate training necessary.—No part of a program of advance will be of greater importance than that which seeks the proper training of the women workers of the church. It is possible to take a consecrated young woman, give her a hurried coaching, and then turn her loose on some church organization; but it is not possible by this method to secure the sterling type of leadership which the church requires in this critical period of expansion.

As the majority of young women seek preparation in training schools, it is necessary that the standards of instruction in such schools be brought to the highest possible level and that regular and post-graduate courses meet recognized educational standards.

Approved courses of study. — The courses of study in the following training schools have been approved by the General Deaconess Board: Boston University School of Religious Education, Boston, Massachusetts; Chicago Training School, Chicago, Illinois; Missionary Training School, Cincinnati, Ohio; Dorcas Institute, Cincinnati, Ohio; Iowa National Training School, Des Moines, Iowa; Folts Mission Institute, Herkimer, New York; Kansas City National Training School, Kansas City, Missouri; D. W. Blakeslee Training School, New Haven, Connecticut; San Francisco National Training School, San Francisco, California; Northwest Training School, Seattle, Washington; Lucy Webb Hayes National Training School, Washington, D. C.

It is advisable to make scholarships available for a limited number of young women of unusual promise, by means of which those without sufficient funds may be encouraged to secure adequate training.

The General Deaconess Board will cooperate with every institution which may be able to contribute to the solution of this problem.

Babies taking sun bath in the sun parlor of a deaconess orphanage

4. PROVIDING REST HOMES AND PENSIONS

Permanent pension payments.—If a deaconess in fulfilling her vow is broken in body by the strain of the modern church, it should be the joy of that church to provide for her a haven of rest and a house of healing. Rest homes are needed.

The claim for pension is recognized, and the General Deaconess Board is delegated to pay pensions to officially retired deaconesses. In order to insure permanency of pension payment an adequate endowment is required. This endowment should not be less than $500,000 and continued effort should be made to secure that sum. As about $70,000 only is in hand, the present pensions are paid largely from the current income of the General Deaconess Board.

5. ADMINISTERING THE BOARD

Enlarged work of board.—The responsibility for carrying out the advanced program of the deaconess work belongs to the General Deaconess Board, for this board has "general supervision of all deaconess work in the church and control of all the deaconesses."

The contribution made by the administration of such a board to the progress of the church cannot be tabulated, but its value appears in a healthier atmosphere, in higher standards of preparation, in broader scope of work, and in co-ordination of effort on the part of all connected with the Deaconess Movement.

WHAT THE SURVEY HAS REVEALED V. WHAT THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH MUST DO FOR ITS PHILANTHROPIC INSTITUTIONS IN THE NEXT TEN YEARS |

I. THE MISSIONARY CHARACTER OF HOSPITALS AND HOMES

THE PLACE OF PHILANTHROPY IN METHODISM

John Wesley's practice.—The preaching of the gospel by John Wesley was accompanied by a practical application of the healing and comforting ministry of Jesus. Mr. Wesley gave attention to the needs of the sick and afflicted in the jails and alms houses and established dispensaries as well as homes for children and aged women. The beginning of Methodism was practical because it was spiritual and had world-wide vision.

Present-day philanthropy.—Today the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States alone operates 173 benevolent institutions, representing a property and endowment value of $36,000,000.

The first Methodist Episcopal Home for Aged was established in 1850 in New York City. There are now thirty-seven such homes in the United States where aged men and women are spending their sunset days in comfort.

The first Methodist Episcopal Home for Children was founded in 1864 at Warren-ton, Missouri, and has been followed by forty-five other homes, where children have the best of care.

The first Methodist Episcopal hospital opened its doors in 1883 in Brooklyn, New York, and there now are seventy-nine other similar institutions in the United States, giving service to 200,000 sick, suffering, and needy people. There are eleven institutions of other kinds, such as homes for working girls, homes for working young men, homes for delinquent girls, homes for retired ministers and tuberculosis sanitariums.

The healing commission.—“Go, preach and heal,” the ideal for all true Christian activity, is still written high on the far-flung battle flag of the Christian church and wherever the message is preached in foreign or home field, it must always be accompanied by a practical ministry of healing and comfort. Bishop James W. Bashford, laying the corner stone of the Woman's Hospital in Peking, China, is a true Christian statesman preaching the whole gospel to the whole of man. Likewise our bishops dedicating hospitals or homes in the United States, are truly representing the missionary spirit of the Christ, for the physical needs are always the same, irrespective of the field of service.

An evangelizing agency.—Every year thousands of men and women from all stations in life who have given little thought to spiritual things find Christ as a personal Saviour while being restored to physical health. Hundreds of boys and girls come to our children's homes from homes broken up by death or other reasons. And here they are nurtured and trained under the care of those who give to them a love and devotion which they could not get elsewhere. This in both instances is a real missionary service rendered in an hour of need.

Modern medical service.—A Methodist Episcopal hospital gives more than medical and surgical service. But it must be remembered that it does give this. Each day is full of care for men and women suffering with pneumonia and heart disease, with goiter and nephritis, with broken legs and appendicitis, with mastoiditis and tonsilitis, for new-born babes and their mothers. They are of all races, colors, and creeds. The first Methodist Episcopal hospital took for its slogan:

“A general hospital which shall be open to Jew and Gentile, Protestant and Catholic, heathen and infidel, on the same terms.”

The dispensaries in connection with the hospitals care for thousands of medical and surgical patients. These patients pay a small amount, in most cases not sufficient to pay for the medicine or necessary medical supplies. Thousands of babies receive care through the Out-patient Department. This all demands adequate plan and equipment, food and medical supplies, and an efficient administrative and medical staff. And it demands of its staff, executives, surgeons, physicians, and nurses, not only professional efficiency, but also Christian character and a passion for service.

The church and public health. — The church claiming for itself a foremost place in the development of spiritual life and Christian education, must perforce equally recognize its obligation in the field of humanitarian effort for social and physical welfare. To neglect this feature will eventually result in a lopsided church program and give to others, who are not Christian, the most important places of leadership.

A Christian home.—A Methodist Episcopal home for children is more than an orphanage. It is a home. Here the lad or girl suddenly thrust out into the world at a time when most needing the love and care of parents finds what an "orphanage" in the accepted definition of such an institution, never can give. Clothes, a bed, and food never make a home for children. They crave parental love and care, which, from Christian men and women, they receive in our forty-five homes for children scattered from Boston to San Francisco. They are taught home ways, Christian truth and right habits and are prepared for the day when old enough to tackle life on their own footing, they go forth to carve their own career. The heartaches comforted, the tragedies averted, the visions opened up, are not to be recorded in type. They are written in the lives of those who are advancing the Kingdom because of what the church put into their lives in childhood's days.

A contented old age.—Old age must ever be lonely. There is always the "last leaf," but old age should not be left to be hard and uncomfortable. In the homes for the aged, the days of sunset are made as bright and cheery as possible. Here the lonely grandmother with children and grandchildren gone, may dream in peace of the days of ambition and hopes and longings and live in memories of him who was her sweetheart and companion of the many years as she daily sees with greater vividness the outlines of the shores beyond. And the while she does this, the attentions of home and church are all provided for her, loving attendants try to bring the joy that the thinning ranks of companions took away, medical care is provided in the hour of need and the going home is made beautiful and comforting.

Free service in hospitals. — Under this caption is included the actual service which is rendered by a hospital or home to a patient or a guest from whom no pay can be expected. There are thousands of such cases brought to the hospitals each year. There are people from all classes and conditions who live far below the average financial income determined by the government as a necessary basis of maintaining individual or home life. In many cases homes have been broken by death or other conditions leaving one or more parties at the mercy of charity and friends. These people are taken to the hospitals by local charitable agencies, police, pastors, and friends. In many instances, it is not possible to secure any money with which to pay for even a week of service in the hospital. Even when this amount is provided for, the patient sometimes is compelled to remain in the hospital for a longer period and thus becomes a charitable patient.

Part pay cases.—The part pay cases in the hospital arise from a large number of people who, as ward patients, are unable to pay sufficient rate even to meet the average cost per patient per day in the hospital. This class also includes a large number of people who come into the hospital with a small amount of money, which is all that they have, and have to depend upon the hospital for the balance of the service rendered to them. Occasionally, these people are dismissed from the hospital with the expectation that they will be able to pay the hospital the balance of the bill, but after a period of time, find that this is an impossibility. The hospital then charges this to part pay service and it is thus reported at the end of the year.

Free service in children's homes.—The survey reveals the fact that sixty per cent of the children received in the homes for children each year are free and part pay cases. In many instances the children are entire orphans or the parent left is in such poor circumstances that no money can be paid for the upkeep of the child, in which instance the service is designated as entire free service. On the other hand, there are instances where the parent will place a child in the home and pay a small amount for its maintenance which amount is below the average cost for a child a day, so that the home must assume the balance of the indebtedness for this maintenance service.

Free service in homes for the aged.—The survey reveals the fact that sixty per cent of the people received in the homes for the aged receive free or part pay service. The average admission fee for entrance into a home for aged is about $400.00. People are not received until they are sixty-five years of age. The average age at the time of being received into a home is sixty-eight years. The average age of expectancy of life for these people is ten years, because people live longer in homes for the aged than they do in other homes, owing to the lack of worry and trouble in taking care of themselves and being responsible for their maintenance, as well as the happy, cheerful conditions which surround them. People upon entering a home, sign a contract by which they give over to the home their possessions. In most cases these possessions are very limited. In the old established homes of the church, it has been ascertained that there are many people who have been received on the basis of $300.00 and have lived from fifteen to eighteen years without any other financial gifts to the home than the entrance fee. This has entailed constant expenditure of money by boards of directors for their maintenance. The estates and money put at the disposal of the boards of directors by people coming into the homes furnish only a small per cent of the finances necessary to maintain the guests over a period of years. It will thus be seen that the homes for aged are constantly facing a losing financial proposition in the maintenance of their aged guests. There are a few guests who are able to pay a sufficient sum of money to keep them over a period of years until their death. However, the survey reveals the fact that these instances are very rare.

Summary of free service. — The total amount of free and part pay work for 1921 in Methodist Episcopal philanthropic institutions totalled $1,695,104, while the total amount of disbursements for all hospitals and homes maintenance and service was $7,974,979; thus showing that twenty-five per cent of all money disbursed for maintenance of hospitals and homes was given for free or part pay service.

The Board of Hospitals and Homes must also place before the churches the needs of national institutions such as the National Sanitarium for Tuberculosis, a National Home for Retired Ministers in favorable climes, and a National Home for Incurables. These institutions must be fostered by the Board of Hospitals and Homes and the board should receive sufficient benevolent funds to promote and maintain them properly for the sake of the whole church and its constituency.

II. BOARD OF HOSPITALS AND HOMES

1. ORGANIZATION AND PURPOSE

Disciplinary provisions. — Recognizing its responsibility in this matter, the Methodist Episcopal Church, through the General Conference in 1920, created the Board of Hospitals and Homes. It is a benevolent board of the church in the same manner as the other benevolent boards. "For the promotion and general supervision of an advisory character for all hospitals, homes, or other organizations and institutions for the care of the sick, incurables, and other dependents, there shall be a board known as the Board of Hospitals and Homes, incorporated according to law and subject to the control of the General Conference."¹ Affiliation. — "All institutions or organizations seeking to affiliate with this board must have the indorsement of the Annual Conference within whose bounds they are located. Institutions or organizations of similar character operating under other boards seeking affiliation with this board must secure the consent of their board, the recommendation of the Annual Conference within whose bounds they operate and the approval of this board."²

Activities. — "This board shall sustain an advisory relation to, but shall not provide direct supervision over institutions or organizations within its jurisdiction except when specifically requested."

"It may make surveys, disseminate information, suggest plans for securing funds, maintain a bureau for the purpose of securing experts in all lines of work, provide architectural data, and render assistance in the promotion and establishment of new institutions. It shall encourage and assist all institutions within its jurisdiction in attaining the highest possible standards. This board may administer any and all funds vested in it for general or specific purposes and shall have power in co-operation with the other benevolent boards, and in the same manner, to secure special funds to carry out and execute its purposes."³

2. THE FUNCTION OF THE BOARD

It will thus be seen that it is the function of the Board of Hospitals and Homes to assist the local hospitals and homes in every department of their work. There has not been enough local initiative to put the whole program on the map. This has been and must continue to be supplied by the Board of Hospitals and Homes. The following instances will illustrate the specific types of work that the Board of Hospitals and Homes does for a local institution:

a. For a children's home.—A children's home within the bounds of a conference had not set up its organization in the Annual Conference. The Board of Hospitals and Homes, with its Department of Survey and Standardization, sent its representative to this home. The representative went over all of the details of the organization very carefully and advised a new form of organization for the local board through the Annual Conference. This organization was put into effect at the next session of the Annual Conference. Conference endowment was secured for the set-up of the American White Cross and through its department of publicity this plan was fully carried into effect in the local churches. A large amount of money was secured for the care of the children in the home as well as a fund for the building of a new home. The Board of Hospitals and Homes through its department of architecture furnished a competent counsellor, who laid out the plans for the new home and gave specific direction to the local architects in the completion of plans for the new structure. The board has kept in definite touch with this organization, which has prospered through the year.

b. For a new hospital.—The Board of Hospitals and Homes was requested to lay out through its Department of Survey and Standardization, the complete plans, for a new Methodist hospital in a conference. The representative met the Annual Conference Board and through it organized a local board of directors and all of the working departments of the hospital.

Through its Department of Publicity and Finance, a representative of the board counselled with the local board of directors in setting up the publicity and campaign plans for securing funds. Through the Department of Architecture, the plot and building plans were laid out and proper architectural services secured for the new hospital. The board has kept in continuous touch with this new development. The hospital has been opened for one year and has prospered financially and has done a fine piece of community work.

c. For homes for aged.—The Board of Hospitals and Homes was asked to take up the development of a home for aged. The same procedure as that indicated for the home for children and the hospital was carried out and the new home is under construction at the present time.

3. ACHIEVEMENTS SINCE 1920

Since the organization of the Board of Hospitals and Homes by the General Conference in 1920, the tasks committed to the board have been undertaken vigorously. It is impossible to state in such brief form the total program that has been put into effect.

a. Conference organization.—Since 1920, Conference Boards of Hospitals and Homes have been organized in most of the Annual Conferences in the United States. The function of the local board in the Annual Conference is to give consideration to all hospital and home interests within the bounds of conference. All new hospital and home projects must have consideration by the local board and presentation of these interests to the Annual Conference for vote before a new hospital or home can be established or financial programs of any character put into effect. This organization is a definite channel through which the local institutions can present their matters to the Annual Conference. The committees which previously handled the affairs of the local institutions, have now been merged into one Annual Conference board, making a much more unified supervision of the entire philanthropic program of the conference.

b. Local boards of directors.—Many local boards of directors have requested reorganization of their hospitals or homes in order to conform to the new General Conference legislation. Many hospitals and homes which did not have the trust clause in their deeds, have had the articles of incorporation and constitution changed, so that practically two-thirds of the hospitals and homes are now held in trust for the Methodist Episcopal Church. In some instances, boards of directors have been entirely reorganized, so that the board is now elected by the Annual Conference instead of being a self-perpetuating body. Many of the older hospitals and homes have been reorganized in their departments of management, finance and methods of operation, thus strengthening local institutions and giving permanence to their work.

c. New Boards of Directors.—The board has adopted standardized articles of incorporation, constitution and by-law for all new hospitals and homes. This new form of organization requires that all hospitals and homes must be organized under the auspices of the Annual Conference within whose bounds they are located and in all instances a majority of the membership of the board of directors must be members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, thus insuring the interest of the Annual Conference in the affairs of the hospital or home. It is only in this way that we can insure permanent organ-

d. Reorganized institutions.—Several hospitals and homes which have been merely local in their organization and administration, have been reorganized and placed under the direct auspices of the Annual Conference and in several instances, under a combined board representing one or more Annual Conferences. This has greatly strengthened the local hospital or home.

e. Standardization of hospitals and homes.—Previous to the organization of the Board of Hospitals and Homes, there had been no definite standards by which hospitals and homes were to operate except in the case of hospitals having the minimum standard adopted by the American College of Surgeons. The board has now adopted definite standards for the hospitals, homes for aged, and homes for children and in so doing, set up a goal to be reached by each local institution. During the past two years, eighteen hospitals have reached the standards which have been adopted by the Board of Hospitals and Homes and the American College of Surgeons, thus making a total of twenty-five hospitals which have reached a high standard in the medical and surgical profession. The Board of Hospitals and Homes will continue its efforts to have each hospital standardized in all its lines of work. We should be 100 per cent standard. All of the homes for children have now met the requirements of the state within whose bounds they are located, relative to sanitation, educational qualifications, and other items that relate to the welfare of orphans. Most of the homes have met the standards adopted by the board in relation to organization and policy and will all be rated A1 in due time.

Many changes have been made in the operation of the homes for aged, in order that they will also meet the classification of A1 homes. These standards relate mainly to health, food, and the general conditions of home life that should characterize a home in which aged people are to live the balance of their days.

Thus the item of standards in relation to the various types of institutions have been very carefully studied and marked progress has been made by all of our philanthropic institutions. This in itself is worth all of the work and service which the board has given to the hospitals and homes during the past two years.

f. Publicity. — The Board of Hospitals and Homes, through its Department of Publicity, has brought to the local hospitals and homes a great inspiration in the character and set-up of new publicity. The director of publicity has prepared booklets illustrative of hospital and home work. The White Cross publicity which has been used throughout the church, has been a great inspiration in setting forth the needs of the hospitals and homes. First-class publicity is absolutely essential if the church is to be educated along the lines of philanthropic service.

g. New vision.—The Board of Hospitals and Homes has given to the local institutions a new vision of their relationship to the church at large and also a consciousness of their place in the entire church program. Through special meetings and conferences, a spirit of co-operation has been developed and real team work is being done by our local institutions. New courage has been given to many boards of directors, which have been on the verge of financial embarrassment. The local superintendent and officials have taken new heart, as they really find the church at large interested in their local projects.

h. Architectural supervision. — The Board of Hospitals and Homes has set itself to the task of working out a definite plan through which better hospitals and homes will be constructed and the most efficient architectural service rendered to the local institutions in their new building programs. Many hospitals and homes have been located through the services of the Department of Survey of the board. Information has been given relative to building, equipment and furnishings. Architectural plans have saved the hospitals and homes large sums of money, and given a better type of structure than heretofore. Thirty-two hospitals and homes have received direct service through this department.

i. Finance.—Through the finance department, the board has given special attention to the financial problems of many local institutions. Financial campaigns have been promoted with the very best of campaign publicity and leadership. During the past two years, over $800,000 has been raised through the organization known as the American White Cross. All of this money has been used for maintenance, building, and endowment. New bookkeeping systems have been established in many hospitals and homes, thus adding to the efficiency of the administrative work in the institution and making it possible for accurate reports to be submitted to the boards of directors each month. Many hospitals and homes have had careful consideration by the department of survey in relation to their expenditures and the possibility of increasing the efficiency of their service through the better handling of their finances and the expenditure of their money.

j. Child welfare. — Special emphasis has been placed upon the necessity of relating the interests of children's homes to the communities along the line of child welfare. This program has been put into effect in many communities and will be promoted as money is available for special workers.

k. New institutions and general development.—It will be impossible to make an adequate statement covering the physical development of the hospitals and homes throughout the past two years. The board set definite goals for its service at the outset and has met them in a very gratifying manner.

It will thus be seen that the philanthropic interests of the church have gone forward very rapidly during the past two years. This has been done without any special embarrassment to the general finances of the church and in many instances the church has hardly known that large sums of money have been contributed to the various local enterprises. The sum total of the whole program should be very gratifying to the church at large.

4. RELATION OF BOARD OF HOSPITALS AND HOMES TO OTHER BOARDS CARRYING ON PHILANTHROPIC WORK

Affiliations of institutions.—All of the institutions affiliated with the Board of Hospitals and Homes are organized and operated either as annual conference institutions or under the Woman's Home Missionary Society, the Board of Education for Negroes, or the Deaconess Association of the annual conference. All these institutions have the recommendation of the annual conference within whose bounds they are located. Some hospitals and homes of the Woman's Home Missionary Society or the Deaconess Associations are the only institutions within the bounds of the annual conference and have combined boards representing the annual conference and the society under whose auspices they operate.

All of the eleven hospitals and dispensaries of the Woman's Home Missionary Society are serving annual conferences within whose bounds there are no regular conference institutions serving the same territory. Four of these are distinctly missionary hospitals and can only exist by missionary aid. They are located at Nome, Alaska; Jacksonville, Florida; Rapid City, South Dakota; and Albuquerque, New Mexico.

The hospitals operating under Deaconess Associations as in the Montana and North Montana Conferences, are entirely dependent upon local conference financial assistance for all free and part pay work. The General Deaconess Board of the Methodist Episcopal Church does not furnish funds with which to pay these deficiencies in income. The same statement is true of the homes for children and aged and other philanthropic institutions. Each serves in a particular way the constituency wherein it is located. There is practically no overlapping of institutions located within the same territory.

There are several hospitals and homes located in the same city that serve conferences of different languages and races, but each has its own constituency, for instance in Chicago there are both the Swedish Home for Aged and the Methodist Episcopal Old People's Home for English-speaking people.

A clear field.—It is the policy of the Board of Hospitals and Homes not to overlap the functions of other boards. Its program as outlined in the legislation is clear and permits it, through various departments of work, to give assistance to all of the various kinds of institutions and different types of work.

The Board of Hospitals and Homes gives advisory supervision to all hospitals and homes which affiliate with it through the provision made in its charter given by the General Conference. In doing so through its various departments, the Board of Hospitals and Homes performs a service in standardization, publicity, finance and architecture that is not given by the other boards of the church.

III. THE METHOD AND SCOPE OF THESE STUDIES

Scope of survey.—The method of survey was a detailed study by a board representative of every hospital and home. The studies covered a period of four years for the hospitals and three years for the homes for aged and children and other types of institutions. Other data were secured from annual reports and the records of superintendents and boards of managers.

Special attention was given to the study of the work done by the hospitals and homes in behalf of the poor and needy, which is classed under free or part pay service cases. The statement of this work appears on pages 603-4.

In the study of the homes for the aged, an attempt has been made to secure data on the amount of part pay service rendered to those guests who have been accepted on the basis of a small payment, which if invested at six per cent interest, would provide for only a small amount of the service rendered over the period of the guest's stay in the home; also a study of the free service accorded guests who pay no entrance fee.

A study of financial methods.—Carefully prepared questionnaires have been sent out to all the hospitals and homes under Methodist Episcopal supervision. The object of the survey has been to ascertain the methods by which the hospitals and homes have been financed and the amount of free or part pay service that is being rendered to needy people. Other items relate to the churches giving financial assistance to hospitals and homes and building endowment funds. An attempt has also been made to ascertain what the philanthropic program of the Methodist Episcopal Church should be for the next ten years.

The survey has revealed the fact that the method of financing the various institutions is thoroughly inadequate and subjects the hospitals and homes to every possible expedient to secure funds. Moreover, it reveals the fact that many of our institutions are in financial jeopardy which threatens their very existence and the welfare of those entrusted to their care.

No survey, however thorough, can fully reveal all the needs of a hospital or home. But it does serve to indicate present needs and future lines of advance.

IV. WHAT THE SURVEY HAS REVEALED

(Explanation of Statistical Table—Pages 610-611)

a. Concerning the hospitals

The survey thus shows that of the total number of patients 220,076, treated in the hospitals in 1921, sixteen per cent received free or part pay service amounting to $1,043,809. Toward paying this amount, 7,590 churches gave $469,290 leaving a deficit of $574,519 to be raised by any kind of methods found possible in the local communities, such as fairs, bazaars, suppers, tag days, entertainments, and other uncertain methods of finance.

A few hospitals give as much as fifty per cent free and part pay service. There should be at least thirty per cent free and part pay service given by each hospital. This, however, can only be made possible through more generous support by the churches. Less than one fourth of the charges in the Methodist Episcopal Church make any contribution to the hospitals at the present time.

The general church must be responsible for a larger proportion of the needy people than it has been heretofore.

b. Concerning the homes for aged

The survey shows that of the total number of guests, 1,652 in the homes for aged in 1920-1921, sixty per cent received free or part pay service amounting to $355,680.

Toward paying this amount, 4,344 churches gave $192,402, leaving a deficit of $163,278 to be raised by such other methods as may be devised.

The sixty per cent of free and part pay service given by the homes for the aged is in about the right proportion to the needs as represented by the present bed capacity. However, there are hundreds of aged people who should have the tender care of the church. Many of these are in homes under other denominations or in county homes.

c. Concerning the homes for children

The survey shows that of the total number of guests, 3,281, in the homes for children in 1920-1921, sixty per cent received free or part pay service amounting to $432,625.

Toward paying this amount 3,906 churches gave $320,893, leaving a deficit of $111,732 to be raised by other methods.

The 60 per cent free and part pay service given by the children's homes is in about the right proportion to the needs. However, there are thousands of orphans who should have the care of the church, but are now in the state, county, and municipal homes or have been entirely lost to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

d. Concerning other institutions

The survey shows that of the total number of guests, 840, in the other institutions in 1920-1921, forty per cent received free or part pay service amounting to $22,990.

Toward paying this amount, thirty-one churches gave $5,092, leaving a deficit of $17,898 to be raised by other methods.

e. Summary

The total number of buildings owned by the various boards aggregate 449. Allowing ninety feet front for each building, they would reach a distance of seven and four-fifth miles in solid frontage. If placed equal distance from each other on a stretch of land sixty feet wide, owned by the various local boards, it would represent a hospital, home for aged, home for children or some other type of institution, reaching 366 miles.

As many people entered the doors of the hospitals and dispensaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church, during one year, 220,076, as live within the bounds of the city of St. Paul, or Columbus, Ohio. People of all races, creeds and color, of all physical and financial conditions with all types of diseases, were diagnosed and treated.

The total amount of free and part pay service rendered through the hospitals amounted to $1,043,809. This is equal to one-fourteenth of the total amount of benevolences raised and expended by the various Boards of Benevolence of the Methodist Episcopal Church during the year 1921. The church has given the service of 1,400 physicians and surgeons, and 2,500 nurses who ministered in the spirit of Christ in a way that can scarcely be duplicated by any other form of ministry. Two thousand members of boards of directors and trustees are interested in the welfare of these institutions.

In the homes for children the number of boys and girls, 3,281, receiving care from interested matrons, superintendents, and officers represents a small city itself. To these children, the church gave in free and part pay service a total of $432,625.

Through the homes for the aged, 1,652 aged people received service which cost the church $355,680.

V. WHAT THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH MUST DO FOR ITS PHILANTHROPIC INSTITUTIONS IN THE NEXT TEN YEARS

A TEN-YEAR FORECAST

a. A more complete survey.—A careful study of the uncharted sections of the country should be made showing localities where there are no hospitals and homes in order to discover what opportunities there are for the Methodist Episcopal Church.

b. A program of education.—The church must be educated to a full realization of its responsibility to the sick, homeless, aged, and orphans. There should be presented to the church a constructive philanthropic program which should become an integral part of the church's work. It is only by thus doing that our philanthropic institutions will be able to contribute their part in developing a complete program of service. This program should then put it into effect until the needs are met and the point of saturation for the service of hospitals and homes has been reached.

Sun-parlor and rest-room in a home for aged women

c. Disease prevention. — The church must come to a vision of its opportunity and duty for the prevention of disease.

d. High standards.—The local institutions must reach the standards which have been adopted by the Board of Hospitals and Homes and other agencies and thus be placed in a position to give the most efficient service. The staff organizations in the hospitals must be properly developed in such a way that the highest class of diagnostic, medical and surgical work will be performed through co-ordinating groups in order to render the very best of service to the community. Ours must have higher standards of service than those institutions which are classified as non-Christian. The distinct feature of our hospital and home program must be the character of service rendered to the physical, intellectual, moral, and spiritual life of the community.

The pathological laboratory in a great Methodist hospital

e. An integral part of Christianity. — There must be developed a higher regard among physicians and surgeons for their relationship to the health needs of the world as a part of the Christian program. This must begin in the development of the undergraduate men and women who are coming into the universities and colleges for preparatory work. It must also be carried into medical schools where the undergraduates are to have their training. The physician and surgeon have within their power the possibility of becoming

The board fosters a constructive program for the training of nurses great missionary forces for the church both in home and foreign fields. Service of this type is a good entering wedge.

f. The training of nurses.—There must be developed a constructive program of training work in the schools of nursing in the hospitals. To this end, the Board of Hospitals and Homes must set forth a definite policy by which it can reach the best equipped young women from the high schools and colleges and place them in the proper schools so they can be trained into the best of nurses and special workers for the hospitals. Nurse training for hospital service begins a long time previous to entering the hospital.

The same plan must be carried out for training of high-grade executives, matrons and supervisors of homes for both the aged and children.

g. Community relationships.—The Board of Hospitals and Homes must seek to relate local hospitals and homes as a distinct part of the service of the church, to the various other interests of the community. Many institutions have not yet realized that they have any duty to perform, other than that of doing their distinctive type of work irrespective of any relationship to other agencies of the same community.

h. A permanent financial policy.—The church must formulate a constructive financial policy for the securing both of maintenance for the care of free and part pay service and of endowment funds necessary to carry on the specific work of the institutions throughout a period of years. This is a very important matter and must have the closest scrutiny and the best thought given to it. Many hospitals and homes cannot expect to be in existence fifty years from now, if they continue working under their present plan of financial support. Large sums of money must be raised for endowment, through special gifts, through annuities, and through various other plans.

The survey as previously stated, reveals the lack of uniformity in financial plans for the various institutions and the lack of co-operation throughout the church for making our institutions secure throughout the years. To help secure the needed uniformity is an aim of this board.

A SUMMER SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY

Who could have prophesied that these few years would gather so many hundreds into these modern Schools of the Prophets, so that young ministers should thus be brought more and more to love God with all their minds and all their hearts to the end that they might love him with all their strength?

EDWIN HOLT HUGHES

COMMISSION ON COURSES OF STUDY

WHY THE COMMISSION WAS FORMED

The Methodist Episcopal Church has 16,545 pastoral charges in the United States. The progress of all her work rests in the end upon the efficient leadership of these men. No more serious task confronts the church than the training of her ministry.

For years we have been giving attention to our colleges and seminaries, and the millions we have invested has been money wisely spent. But only recently have we awakened to the seriousness of another part of the problem. The fact is that only one out of five of our ministers is a graduate of college and seminary, while one out of four of the men has not even gone beyond the high school. In a day when trained leadership is an absolute necessity, when high-school and college enrolment mounts by leaps and bounds, what have we done for these men, the great majority of our preachers, who have not had the full equipment of the schools? Very little, it must be said, in the past. Once in four years the bishops, through a committee, revised the list of books which formed a prescribed course of study. Once a year for four years the young preacher was examined in these books. And that was all. We spent millions on our schools; on these men we spent nothing though they were the great majority of our ministry.

ITS ORGANIZATION

In 1916, the forward step was taken. We came to see that what was needed was not a series of examinations but an educational institution. The first step was to provide for a permanent commission to work with the boards of examiners and to plan and direct the training of these students. In 1920, the commission was enlarged, a modest budget was assured, and an educational director was placed in charge. Today this work forms the greatest single theological institute in the world, with 2,500 men in training in its courses, and over 1,500 examiners directing the actual work.

THE COMMISSION'S BUSINESS

a. Arranging a curriculum.—The first task of the commission was to outline the course of study for these men. It had to decide what subjects should be studied and how much time should be given to each. It had to find books fitted for men who were studying by themselves, and in some cases to have these books specially prepared. It had to train men in the great historic convictions of the church as well as to introduce them to the thought and problems of present-day life. Of the forty-seven volumes which the men study in their course, including the examination for admission, nine deal with history and biography, eight with the Bible, six with the practical work of the preacher and pastor, five with theology, three with religious education, and three with sociology and social service. Ten of these books deal with Methodism, its history, biography, doctrines, and polity.

In this part of its work the commission has stood in close relation with the bishops. In fact the bishops have given far more attention to the course of study under the new plan than in former years. The commission itself is elected by them, though three of its members are nominated by the Board of Education. It selects three of its own number as members of the commission, one of them being the chairman of the commission and all sharing actively in its work. The books of the course as it now stands have had the approval of the bishops after full consideration by them.

b. Making schools.—It is one thing to arrange a course of study; it is quite another to make a school. Merely to assign books and give examinations are not enough. Here are 3,000 men who cannot go away to school, who are already serving churches as pastors, who are not trained students. What can be done to teach them first of all how to study; then to interest them in this work; to lay out their tasks for them plainly step by step; to give them individual help and guidance; and if possible to bring them into personal contact with instructors and with other students? What follows shows how the commission is trying to do this.

1. Directions and helps—a substitute teacher.—Each year of his course the student must study ten or twelve books. Four or five of them give him his principal subjects of study, the others being for collateral reading. This student needs guidance far more than does the college man in the seminary. His greatest handicap is not lack of learning but lack of training in the art of study. So the commission supplies him with a manual of Directions and Helps to take the place of the teacher as far as is possible. He has five of these for his course, averaging over two hundred pages each, one for his examination for admission and one for each of the four years. These manuals give general suggestions for his study; outline plans for his work and tell him how to proceed; furnish explanations, comments, and suggestive questions. They refer to other books. They seek to stimulate his own thought, and quicken his interest. They point out the meaning of each study for his work, and show him especially how he can utilize this work for his pulpit.

2. Building a correspondence school.—Ideally the course of study is a correspondence school, and the first steps to this end have been taken. The most important is the provision for required written work as outlined in the Directions and Helps. Step by step in his work the student is required to express his thoughts and give evidence of his work in written exercises. Most of these are very simple but they change mere passive memorizing into active thought and study, and they afford a training in exact thought and effective expression that is of special value to the preacher. This written work the student is expected to hand at regular intervals to the examiner, receiving it back with corrections and suggestions. The next step may be the establishment of a central agency with a force giving all its time to this work, to which, when a given conference so elects, the students may send in all their written work.

3. Summer schools of theology.—Here is a striking development looking toward the making of a real system of education out of the course of study. The beginnings of this work reach back for years, but except in a few notable instances, these gatherings of students and examiners were simply conference for coaching and examinations. In 1921 the advance began: thirteen schools were held. In 1922 there were thirty-five, in some cases a number of conferences co-operating in one school. This year the number will probably be increased to fifty, with at least fifteen hundred students in attendance besides examiners and other preachers. The attendance is usually required. Expenses are reduced to a minimum and often special aid is given. The term is about ten days. Classes are conducted in the subjects of the course. Special lecturers of first rank are brought in. The student gains personal contact with the examiners under whom he has been doing his work as well as with fellow students. The stimulus and inspiration which this means for the young man who has been working alone in some remote village or country point cannot be overestimated. Commonly the school is held at the seat of one of our colleges and not a few men have their feet turned to college halls because of this experience.

c. Training local preachers in supply charges.—Here is the most difficult single task in training its leaders which our church has. Last year 4,416 pastoral charges were "left to be supplied." These are not our largest churches but in countless cases they represent the only religious privileges that are furnished to folk in the village, on the frontier, or in the open country. Some of these churches are supplied by students and retired ministers but nearly three-fourths of them are cared for by local preachers, of whom about two thirds are giving full time to this work. These are men who have not been received into the annual conference, it may be because of age, for lack of education, or for some other deficiency. Here then is a group of about two thousand preachers, giving full time to the church, differing only in the fact they are not members of any conference.

The need of training for these men is peculiarly urgent. Three-fifths of these supply pastors have not had more than a high-school education; one-third of them did not go beyond the eighth grade. But for the training of these men the church in the past has done practically nothing. A very simple course of study was provided. Sometimes it was studied, more often not. There was no help offered and practically no supervision, though these men need help more than others. And yet we entrusted several thousand of our churches to them. The commission is now giving attention to this neglected group. They are being brought in under the new plan. The Conference Boards of Examiners now have charge of their studies and examinations. A carefully revised course of study is being planned. A special volume of Directions and Helps has been issued for their use, and the summer schools of theology are open to them.

d. Post-graduate courses of study.—The college and seminary are the beginning and not the end of preparation. Systematic study is a vital necessity for the preacher. The pressure of duties, however, makes it hard for the minister to carry on such work. So the commission provides courses of study for the man who has finished the conference course or has graduated from college and seminary. This work is only in its beginnings. The plan is to provide a series of courses covering the various fields of theology so that the minister may choose from among them what will be of most interest and profit to him, and follow this year by year with other courses. Two courses have been issued and some five hundred men enrolled. A special instructor is provided for each course, an expert in the field in question. The student purchases the text-book issued by the commission and the additional books called for, enrolls with the commission, and pays the nominal fee of two dollars. A regular course is marked out, and all his papers are sent in to the instructor who returns the same with comments and suggestions besides aiding the student in any special problems that may arise.

THE FUTURE NEED

The work of the commission is only in its first stage. Not until 1920 did the commission have any budget with which to operate. The remarkable development of such work as that of the summer schools has been made possible by this moderate assistance, as has also the securing of an Educational Director. During 1922, about 1,500 students from fifty conferences attended conference or area summer schools of theology, took the examinations, and discussed their problems with the examiners in person. In the World Service Program, the commission will require $45,000 annually to carry on its work as on the present basis, and asks for $60,000, which was approved and entered as the commission's share of the $18,500,000 apportioned to the churches.

The future will see a great system of education developed on this foundation, enrolling several thousand young men each year, providing the best plans and helps that can be secured, giving the privilege of real correspondence work under expert instructors, bringing them together each year of their four years' course for three or four weeks of inspiring tuition and fellowship, and then directing their continued study after they have finished the regular course. From such work the church may expect a stronger leadership for the more commanding tasks of the coming years.

COMMISSION ON LIFE SERVICE

THE PROBLEM OF PERSONNEL

Quantity. — The Methodist Episcopal Church as it is at present organized, utilizes a personnel numbering 23,272 men and women. If to this number is added the supply pastors who are not members of our annual conferences and the young women who are nurses in training in our hospitals, the total is increased to 28,286 men and women who are devoting their entire time to work under the auspices of our church.

In the above total are included 5,408 women who are serving as teachers in our schools and colleges, directors of religious education, deaconesses, nurses, and in other phases of work under the supervision of the women's missionary societies.

Personnel requirements. — The pastoral charges exceed 16,000, of which more than 4,000 are at present "supply charges." The Board of Foreign Missions lists 936 names of workers in the field, to which may be added 125 retired missionaries often performing special work, and 612 workers of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. The teaching positions in our own church institutions are computed at 3,263. Week-day religious education work, which is only at its beginnings, already is organized in some form at about 800 centers, 331 of which meet in Methodist Episcopal Churches, in which our church is sometimes directly and always co-operatively related. We have eighty hospitals whose staff needs total upwards of 2,500 workers. There are nearly 2,000 deaconesses of the Methodist Episcopal Church in all lands. The six remaining general boards of the church require a large number of workers with special training. This computation does not include workers for local Sunday schools and Epworth Leagues, nor interdenominational organizations such as the American Bible Society, the Y. M. C. A., and the Y. W. C. A.

Losses.—A recent study of the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church made by the commission shows that the total loss in the effective full membership through death, location, withdrawal, and supernumerary and retired relationships during the last four years amounts to 3,025, or an average of 756 each year. Over against this, there were admitted into full membership during the last four years 2,412 men, an average of 603 each year. This means that the church faced an average yearly loss in its regular ministry of 153 men. This, in the face of the fact that the World Service Program will call for a larger number of men in the future than the church is utilizing at the present time.

Quality.—The problem of personnel is not confined entirely to the question of numbers. A church that is inadequately provided with leadership must rely, to an increasing extent, upon unqualified men and women. For instance, the educational qualifications of 2,480 supply preachers is indicated by the following:

Eighth grade or less	857	34.5%
Part high school	486	19.5%
Full high school	228	9.1%
Part college	396	15.9%
Full college	298	12 %
Full theological school.....	102	4.1%
College and theological school.....	113	4.5%
	2,480	99.6%

In the past the pressure under which district superintendents have labored in order to man their charges has caused them to urge young men who were preparing for the ministry to enter actual service more quickly than really was wise. This perhaps accounts, in part, for the fact that out of eighty per cent of the members of annual conferences in effective relation in 1922, eighteen per cent or 2,023 men secured only part of a high-school course, or less than a high-school course; thirty-seven per cent or 4,163 are graduates of high school, have part of a college course or theological without college; forty-five per cent or 5,070 have college or both college and theological training. Out of a total of 11,256, only 2,784 have a full college course, while 2,286 have both college and theological training.

The Council of Church Boards of Education made a study of men in theological seminaries in the United States and Canada in the years 1922 and 1923. Out of 8,300 registered men, 4,500 had at some time or other attended college. Only 3,000 men, however, were college graduates and of that 3,000, one-third were graduates of sub-standard colleges. This means that only one-fourth of the men who were last year preparing for the Protestant ministry in theological seminaries were graduates of standard colleges previous to entering upon theological training.

The Commission on Life Service still receives letters from young men and young women who are anxious to take a short cut in their preparation for Christian service. The church no longer questions whether college and theological training should be a requisite requirement for the Christian ministry. Even on the basis of statistics regarding church membership, Sunday-school enrolment, total benevolences, and salaries, a case could be made showing how costly it is for the church to attempt to carry on its program without demanding adequate educational qualifications. The question, however, assumes much greater proportions than can be estimated by statistical comparisons. The church is today face to face with its primary purpose: the interpretation of the teachings of Jesus, and their application to the problems of human life. For this reason, one of its most important duties is to see that young men and young women looking forward to leadership, are provided with such educational and vocational guidance as will guarantee the largest possible efficiency upon their part.

Only recently has an effort been made by the Methodist Episcopal Church carefully to study its personnel problem. So far as the ministry is concerned, the church never has carried on a systematic cultivation of its choicest material. It is an indication of abundant spiritual inclinations in the heart of young people that only in this late day does the church really feel the embarrassment of a haphazard and uncertain method in recruiting and directing its leadership.

THE COMMISSION RAISED

Before the organization of the Commission on Life Service the various boards of the church acted independently in seeking their personnel.

The authorization of the Commission on Life Service by the General Conference of 1920* was the church's first attempt to unify its procedure. The primary task of the commission is to discover the men and women who are already qualified for effective leadership in the church, and to give guidance to young men and young women who are contemplating full-time Christian work and are in process of preparation.

The various boards of the church have allocated representatives, who in conjunction with the executive secretary and three other workers, constitute the staff of the commission.

THE TASK SURVEYED

Old decisions followed up.—The first task of the Commission on Life Service was to give attention to the lists of names of possible candidates that had accumulated for several years. Staff representatives were urged to eliminate all old names in their files. Communications were sent to more than 50,000 young people whose names were in the files of the commission in July, 1921. Most of these young people had signed their declaration cards with part-time service in mind. Their names were referred to the pastors in their respective communities.

Plans to avoid confusion.—The Commission on Life Service immediately began to study how to avoid much of the confusion that had prevailed in the past. An excellent pamphlet, Concerning Life Service Appeals, was distributed widely to Epworth League institutes and to pastors. The Board of the Epworth League, through its Life Service Secretary, exercised increasing caution in regard to its program of recruiting. The life service conferences in connection with colleges and universities were planned with primary emphasis upon personal interviews rather than upon public addresses. The literature of the commission was supplied freely wherever any groups of Methodist young people were in conference, as Epworth League institutes, Sunday-school institutes and summer schools, Christian Associations, Student Volunteer conventions, and Older Boys' conferences.

SOME RESULTS

Recruits for the ministry.—During the years 1921 and 1922, the commission was in touch with 1,225 men and eighteen women who are considering the ministry as their life work. Their educational status, not counting those in theological seminaries, was as follows:

Total recruits.—As the result of the total recruiting activity of the church during the years 1921 and 1922, 9,906 names were received by the Commission on Life Service. Over 3,000 of these names were received directly from pastors. A few of these young people have not yet entered high school. The great majority are in high school. A large number are either endeavoring to secure funds to carry on their college work or are already securing their college education.

Names in file.—The Commission on Life Service had the names of approximately 16,000 young men and young women in its files at the beginning of the year 1923. It must be remembered that there exists in the minds of many young people great uncertainty about their life service. This is indicated by an analysis of the names of recruits received from the Epworth League during the years of 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921. The total number of names received was 9,617. Communications were sent to all these young people with a request for more detailed and specific information regarding their intention. Failure to reply or replies requesting that their names be dropped caused the withdrawal of 5,480 names up to the beginning of 1923.

RELATION OF THIS COMMISSION TO THE GREAT COMMISSION

The Commission on Life Service is anxious to avoid having young people sign life service decision cards or commit themselves in any way when they are too young.

On the other hand, the commission believes it is absolutely necessary for the church to keep closely in touch with all young men and young women who actually are interested in placing their lives at the disposal of the church. In a great many instances the earlier communications deal only with a declaration of purpose or intention. The majority of the life service decision cards which are signed indicate no definite choice of a vocation. Out of the total of approximately 16,000 names, 5,926 are still indefinite regarding the kind of work they wish to undertake. In addition, a large number, just how many we are unable to state, have not yet made a final decision regarding their life work. Both of these groups, however, have indicated a real intention to enter upon some full-time work under the direction of the church if the church can use them.

The Methodist Episcopal Church has little to fear regarding its future leadership, if it continues to give definite information to its young people regarding its program. The need for definite information increases in proportion as the candidates come to the close of their period of preparation. For this reason, the commission publishes its Bulletin of Personnel Needs. In this are presented, quarterly, the immediate demands of the church. It is designed to be of special value in securing the final commitment of men and women to a definite task.

Behind this final commitment, as a rule, lie many months and possibly years when interest must be stimulated and intelligence cultivated by general information. Young men and young women who have received information and who have been encouraged to consider full-time Christian service, but who do not finally enter full-time service, will render more intelligent part-time service because of these contacts.

HOW THE COMMISSION WORKS

In general, the procedure of the Commission on Life Service is as follows:

1. Pastors, District Superintendents, Life Work Secretaries of Epworth League Institutes, Sunday-school teachers, and all others are urged to send in the names of any young men and young women whom they know to be considering full-time Christian work.

2. The Commission on Life Service helps to provide secondary schools, colleges, and universities (including state universities), with representatives for life work conferences. Group meetings and personal interviews are especially emphasized in these conferences.

3. The Commission on Life Service endeavors to secure information concerning all young men and young women whose names are in its files. On the basis of this information correspondence is invited and special literature is forwarded, which may be of value to young people facing life work decisions.

4. The Commission on Life Service also supplies posters, pamphlets, and bulletins to institutes, conferences, colleges, and universities, as well as to individuals.

5. Whenever it is apparent that a fairly mature interest and concern is manifested in some special form of work or in one particular field of service, the recruit is placed in touch with the board that is most responsible for that particular work or field. If an opportunity for service does not come in connection with one board, an effort is made to discover whether appointment and employment is possible or advisable in some other department of the church.

6. The Commission on Life Service believes that the actual recruiting of the future leadership of the church will always be very largely done by pastors, Sunday-school teachers, and workers in the local churches. Therefore, it seeks to stimulate a new degree of attention to the matter on the part of the local church both by means of denominational and interdenominational approaches.

7. The Commission on Life Service seeks from colleges and universities such vocational and educational information as they may gather concerning young men and young women who may be considering full-time Christian work. The commission desires the privilege of having its staff representatives interview these young people, and always hopes that these representatives will be utilized in interviewing students who may be undecided or indefinite regarding their life work.

FUTURE NEEDS

In the World Service Program the commission will require $54,677 annually to carry on its work as at present, and asks for $75,000 which asking was approved and entered as the commission's share of the $18,500,000 apportioned to the church.

WORK

*Let me but do my work from day to day
In field or forest, at desk or loom;
In roaring market place or tranquil room
Let me but find it in my heart to say,
When vagrant wishes beckon me astray—
"This is my work; my blessing, not my doom;
Of all who live, I am the one by whom
This work can best be done in the right way."*

*Then shall I see it not too great, nor small,
To suit my spirit and to prove my powers;
Then shall I cheerful greet the laboring hours
And cheerful turn, when the long shadows fall
At eventide, to play and love and rest
Because I know for me my work is best.*

COMMITTEE ON CONSERVATION AND ADVANCE

I. THE COMMISSION ON FINANCE

Influenced by certain conditions which were set forth at length in the Episcopal Address to the General Conference of 1912 and by many memorials from the various parts of the church calling attention to grave defects in the system of financing the local and benevolent budgets, the General Conference of 1912 appointed a Commission on Finance which should during the quadrennium attempt to devise a better system and if possible unify the financial appeals.¹

Previous to 1912, a number of attempts had been made to co-ordinate the benevolent appeals of the church, but they faced baffling and perplexing difficulties and none of them were of any far-reaching significance.

General duties.—The Commission on Finance undertook to secure from the benevolent boards their statements of need, revise their askings, and determine the total amount to be apportioned to the churches. The commission also made the apportionments; co-operated with the boards in promoting the unity and efficiency of their financial appeals, informed the congregations concerning all departments of the financial activity of the church; and strove earnestly to put into operation the new financial plan calling for an every-member canvass and a subscription for benevolent and current expenses on a weekly basis.

II. THE COUNCIL OF BOARDS

a. Inception.—The celebration of the Centenary brought with it enlarged plans of education, promotion, and giving, as well as increased administrative duties to all the benevolent boards. After the great financial campaign of 1918-19, culminating in the five-year Centenary subscription, the organization responsible for the activities of the Centenary was replaced by the Centenary Conservation Committee.

The General Conference of 1920, after considering the whole range of activities of the Commission on Finance, the Centenary Conservation Committee, and the new and forward-looking work necessary for the maintenance of the church's benevolent program, amalgamated all these functions into our new organization called the Council of Boards of Benevolence.

The organization and duties of the Council and its committees are fully outlined in the Discipline of 1920.¹

b. Departments of work.—To carry out the provisions of the General Conference, the functions of the Committee on Conservation and Advance are grouped under the finance, educational, and field departments, all correlated under a general administration.

1. Finance Department

One of the most important central agencies ever established in our church is the Finance Department of the Committee on Conservation and Advance. To the general treasurer are remitted more or less regularly from the churches of the United States their offerings for the general benevolent work of the church. Vouchers in the form of receipts are issued and records are kept of all these offerings by charges. This means the accounting of an average of over a million dollars a month in remittances, most of it in comparatively small amounts.

At the end of each month the general treasurer distributes these sums to the various benevolent boards and agencies and keeps the records and accounts of this distribution in perfect order. At the same time, he must examine, approve, and pay the bills for the central office and make the necessary regular remittances for the expenses of the twenty-three area offices.

Statistics.—Our system of apportionment in the Methodist Episcopal Church means that there must be available accurate and uniform statistics on all items involving church membership, value of property, amount of local support, benevolent and per capita giving. An earnest effort is being made to establish a uniform statistical system for the whole church in order that our statistical records may be as perfect as possible.

Apportionments.—From these statistics available in the office of the general treasurer, the apportionments are calculated. The enormous labor involved in making, sending out, and finally recording these apportionments is indicated on page 690.

Budgets. — The Council of Boards through the Executive Committee is required to receive and pass upon the administrative budgets of all the related boards and agencies. The central office receives these budgets and prepares them for the Executive Committee and Council.

Uniform audit.—During recent years, it has become apparent that a more or less uniform system of accounting should be established in the various boards and that the financial operations of our church should be simplified as largely as possible and that much saving could be effected if some central auditing agency could be established. Much progress has been made on this problem, but there is still much to be desired.

It will be seen that in the receiving and accounting of such large sums as are now involved in our benevolent giving, the problems are complex and difficult and a central treasury and clearing house for all financial matters are absolutely necessary.

2. Educational Department

The whole problem of keeping the benevolent interests before the church through the special methods of publicity and education is the responsibility of the Educational Department of the Committee on Conservation and Advance.

Stewardship.—The stewardship division prepares and distributes stewardship tracts and pamphlets of tried and tested methods, and conducts the correspondence with church leaders and especially with the volunteer district stewardship secretaries. This division creates and meets demands for stewardship speakers for all sorts of meetings and occasions. It also is endeavoring to vitalize the stewardship committee of the quarterly conference in the local church. If to this is added the demands of the publicity department for live up-to-date stewardship material, it will be observed that the necessary writing and editing is enormous.

A central publicity bureau.—The publicity division furnishes weekly to all of our official papers, material on the needs and achievements of our benevolent work through the world. The assembling of this material, the research required for its accurate statement and the actual writing is a large part of this division's work. Items for the press associations and for local newspapers are furnished for Methodist events. Articles of general and denominational interest are continually placed in the leading magazines and periodicals. All pamphlet and periodical literature is prepared by or passes through the hands of this division.

Thus, there is growing up a well-staffed central publicity bureau for the Methodist Episcopal Church, one that does not become a mere propaganda agency but is an informing, inspiring and evangelizing force in the broadest sense.

Stereopticon lectures.—Our church has taken the lead in the production and distribution of lantern slides and the distribution of stereopticon and motion picture projection apparatus. In the central office there are now over 100,000 negatives which are captioned, classified, and catalogued, covering all fields and all phases of our work at home and abroad. Lectures, story sets, and illustrated hymns are distributed through the twenty-three area offices. The recent decision of the Council to offer this material to the churches free of rental has doubled the demands on this division.

Pageants and plays.—This division, one of the best equipped in America, is endeavoring to provide the most approved pageant and educational dramatic material available in order to satisfy the new rising demand for social and dramatic expression in our churches, especially among the children and young people. This involves the careful reading and preparation of plays, demonstrations, and pageants; and the provision of costumes, curios, and accessories for vivid and effective presentation. Through lectures and demonstration courses in colleges and training schools, a new leadership for this work is being stimulated.

Mission study.—The responsibility for co-operating with the Missionary Education Movement in planning the mission-study books for all ages rests with the educational department. The promotion of missionary addresses, methods conferences, study classes in institutes and summer schools, and the training of missionary education leaders is also cared for in this department.

Church Training Night.—This division is a clearing house for the exchange of material for church training night, rapidly becoming the outstanding mid-week service of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It recommends suitable texts and aspires to do more than merely record classes and keep records. It hopes to be and is a reliable source of information on the best materials and methods.

Quarterly conference committees.—For the promotion of education and giving in the interest of our general benevolences in the local church, the prime responsibility is with the quarterly conference committee on apportioned benevolences. To revitalize and make effective the work of this committee, the department prepares special literature and stimulates more active responsibility in the local church. Beginning with the apportioned benevolence committee, the department hopes to reach out and help all of the local church quarterly conference groups to more efficient service.

3. Field Department

The field department brings the challenging achievements and needs of our benevolent work through the living voice to the churches of the United States. To this end it correlates the field presentations of all the boards and provides additional speakers and workers for districts, conferences, and areas, for all sorts of meetings and occasions.

Field workers.—The assignment of general field workers, home and foreign missionaries, and special representatives to the various areas is done by the field department. The most effective use of the time of these workers in satisfying the various demands of the field is a difficult problem for the central promotional agency.

The area offices.—All relations with the area offices are maintained by the field department. This involves the necessary correlation of field programs throughout the church for the effective use of field workers.

The area secretary is the educational and promotional agent for a given episcopal area and through his office, in co-operation with the resident bishop, the churches find their contacts with the larger organizations.

Inspirational meetings.—The field department also has opportunity to give counsel on the program of great inspirational and educational gatherings as well as for conference, district and sub-district meetings, and is in constant demand to supply speakers for such meetings and for local churches.

Annual conference visitation.—The arrangements for anniversaries and for the visits of the representatives of the different benevolent boards and agencies to the annual conferences is made through the field department. Attempts and adjustments are being made continually to make these presentations of greatest value to ministers and laymen.

4. General Administration

The co-ordination of all of this work of the committee is in the general administration which also has immediate charge of the central office and all of its departments and different functions.

Life service.—While the General Conference of 1920 created a Commission on Life Service, it also authorized the Committee on Conservation and Advance to carry out "the plans of the Council of Boards of Benevolence for the enlistment of the youth for Christian life service." In view of these provisions, the Commission on Life Service is happily located in the offices of the Committee on Conservation and Advance and its work closely correlated with our general administration.

Meetings and minutes.—The calls for the various committees including the meetings of the Executive Committee and the Council are sent from the general office and minutes of all of these meetings are recorded and sent out by this central agency. The general administration also is responsible for arranging the dockets and preparing the business for the Council as well as caring for the necessary details as to place of meeting.

HELEN BARRETT MONTGOMERY

WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY

I. THE BEGINNINGS

"The Founders."—Fifty-four years ago, on a stormy twenty-third of March, there met in the vestry of Tremont Street Church, Boston, a group of eight women whose names have gone into history as "The Founders" of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. There might have been others, for the women of thirty churches had been notified of the meeting. Some years later a little woman stood wistfully before the memorial window which records the names of "The Founders." "My name ought to have been there," she remarked. "Were you one of that historic group?" inquired a sympathetic voice. "No, but I ought to have been! I was invited and had my bonnet on ready to go but I untied it and stayed at home because of the storm." The intrepid women who did not loose their bonnet strings and succumb to the comforts of home and shelter, breathed into the new organization the breath of determination and sacrifice which have ever since characterized it. Mrs. Clementina Butler came through the storm from South Boston, and Mrs. Lois Parker from Malden, their hearts burning with a desire to rouse Methodist women to a sense of the need which they, as wives of missionaries, had seen in India.

Thoburn the prophet.—God has his own calendar and knows no limitations of space. Even while moving on the hearts of women in Boston, he was putting into the mind of Thoburn, missionary seer in India, the conviction that the East could not be evangelized without the personal help of women. Accordingly he urged his sister, then teaching in Ohio, to join him in India. She presented her name to the young society at its first public meeting. Then came from India a plea for a medical woman; and Dr. Clara Swain volunteered.

The first missionaries.—The two young women set out on their venture of faith in November of the same year, backed only by the promise of prayers and support on the part of a few daring women. Their experiences read like a romance, but can be matched in essential details by those of pioneers in every mission land. Men did not appreciate their purpose; women did not comprehend it. The religious teachers of the East had all denied to women the right to develop and achieve and had engendered a feeling of disrespect, if not of contempt, for her. She was looked upon as a tool or toy, a baneful influence to be kept in restraint for society's good. It is not strange that the civilizations of the East became static and decadent, for "no nation can rise above the level it sets for its womanhood." Christ alone of religious teachers recognized "no male nor female," no double standards by which to judge the guilty, no limitations in development because of sex. His gospel was good news, indeed, to the women of the East; but when it reached them it found them with little hope or aspiration either for themselves or for their daughters. Only one woman in a thousand in China and a possible eight in a thousand in India could read. Girl babies were not welcomed. Baby towers, the Yangtze, and the Ganges were requisitioned to lessen the numbers of those for whom dowries must otherwise be provided and husbands procured. One need not be surprised that thousands of little girls were dedicated to lives of slavery under the name of religion as "temple attendants;" that even yet in India there are 2,500,000 child wives, and 40,000,000 women locked within harems and zenanas, virtual prisoners for life.

II. FROM MUSTARD SEED TO TREE

SOME OF THE SEEDS

In India.—When Miss Thoburn went to India, men there were saying: "We believe in the depravity of women and the sanctity of a cow." They were not cordial to her efforts to educate their daughters. Her first little bazaar school had to be guarded at the entrance by a boy armed with a club.

In China, Japan, and Korea.—The Woolston sisters in China met like opposition. In Japan, Dora Schoonmaker was driven out five times in one year from the quarters she had rented for her girls' school. In Korea women were so little esteemed they did "not even have a name."

SOME OF THE TREES

In India.—But all this represents another and very different day. Miss Thoburn's bazaar school developed into the first Christian College for women in the Orient. It has received generous recognition from the government and has just moved into fine new buildings, as the Woman's Department of Lucknow University. Students, including sixteen Hindu and Moslem girls, come from all parts of India. The first woman dentist, the first Mohammedan woman physician, the first woman agriculturalist in India, and the first woman in North India to take a Master of Arts degree, are graduates of Isabella Thoburn. A brilliant alumna who gives promise of being a second Lilavati Singh, is now taking the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at Columbia as the first holder of the Edith Jackson Fisher Fellowship.

In China.—The school which the Woolston sisters planted has grown into our splendid Hwa Nan College, beautiful for situation and for cultured Christian womanhood of its alumnae and student body. The students conduct Sunday schools and public welfare activities in the villages about Foochow. One of the graduates, a specialist in religious education from Boston, makes this group of thirty villages her special parish. Every member of the Senior class is a Christian. No one can estimate the influence of the teachers, the Bible women, and the home makers who have gone from this school into the life of China and Malaysia. A recent red letter day was the sod-breaking ceremony for the new Lydia Trimble dormitory, toward which the students and alumnae raised ten thousand dollars gold.

In Japan.—The school which Miss Schoonmaker persisted in re-starting in Tokyo developed into our crowded Aoyama High School of 700 pupils, from which 450 girls had to be turned away this year. A class of ninety-five graduated in March, 1922.

In Korea.—Ewa Haktang is as yet the only school in all Korea which offers higher education to girls. So eager are these maidens of Chosen for an education that they storm the doors for admission and are content to sleep on the bare floor if only they may remain. One girl walked 150 miles from her home last year to attend the school. The present enrolment (from kindergarten through college departments) is 620.

Again in China.—These are only typical illustrations. Let one more suffice: Fifty years ago Gertrude Howe, in spite of protesting friends, "threw her life away on the Chinese." She braved opposition and started a school with little castaway babies as a nucleus. She lives today to see as a result of her life's investment, three fine high schools, three hospitals in charge of former pupils, a home for cripples, four boarding schools, seventy day schools with two thousand pupils, and hundreds of homes presided over by queenly Christian women trained in her schools. She was also one of the founders of the West China Mission.

III. THIS FREEDOM

The "new woman" in the East.—In short, the leaven a few women took and hid in the meal has lifted the whole mass. Of all the movements that characterize the East today, none is more significant than the "woman movement." "The World was Made for Women, Too," is inscribed over the door of a woman's clubroom in India! "I believe in equal rights, in equal chance to work and in equal pay," said one of our brilliant Chinese graduates, now a doctor in charge of one of our hospitals. An editorial in the New Woman, a paper published by the graduates of Ewa Haktang, says, "For ages women have been treated like animals and have been under man's foot. For ages we have been fettered by unbroken customs. Now we propose to lay aside these fetters and be free. It is the purpose of this magazine to discourage immorality and to stand for high ideals to the end that women may have equal responsibilities, equal leisure."

The logical result of the gospel.—One need not be disturbed by this militant woman movement, unwittingly projected by our modest mothers and the missionaries they sent out. It is the logical consequent of education, of contact with the West, and of preaching the Christian doctrine. However, unless "this freedom," coveted by our sisters of the East, be tempered by Christian principles and ideals, it shall have been obtained with a great price." That price will be the break-down of family and social life and the surrender of whatever virtues the old order did possess. Without the standards and safeguards of Christianity, without right ideals of woman and of her proper place in social uplift, this new movement carries within itself elements of far-reaching danger. "It is a Niagara that will destroy, or it can be made a dynamo of power." Truth may be stronger than error but unpropagated error goes farther than unuttered truth. Wrong ideals of the western woman reach the East by cables, press, radio, and cinema. The Christian woman is not so advertised. We must make her ideals known by increasing the number of those who may become and who can create wise leaders for these restless, aspiring hosts. They are tearing the veils from their faces. We must lift the veils also from their hearts and minds. We must create a Christian literature for them and provide more Bible women to expound the truth which will make free. We must equip our higher institutions of learning, normal schools, college libraries, and laboratories in order to meet this emergent situation.

A united financial campaign. — Again, events were divinely timed: Contemporaneous with this "Feminist Movement," God put into the hearts of Christian women of different denominations the desire to promote a united financial campaign for the building and equipment of six Union Colleges for women in the Orient. Approximately $3,000,000 was raised by this fine co-operative effort: Methodist women contributed $271,958.86. Added to this, the Rockefeller credits and the amount raised by the Methodist women for their own colleges bring their total to $491,884.86.

IV. REPORTS

1. THE FINANCES OF THE SOCIETY

Treasury.—The Society, at its annual meeting, makes a budget and appropriations for the coming year—from an empty treasury! It is an act, not of presumption, but of faith to be accompanied by "works." Appropriations generally provide for at least a ten per cent increase in returns. The appropriations for the current year total $2,357,276, allowing 3.2 per cent only, for both home and foreign administration expense. There are no salaried officers and all items of expense are kept at the lowest possible level.

From "two cents" to the tithe.—"Two Cents a Week and a Prayer" was the slogan and pledge of the members in the early days of the society. The dues continue to be one dollar per year, but no woman today can satisfy herself with a gift so meager—nor did our mothers. They supplemented dues by "tithes and offerings," annuities, bequests, and memorials. Sixty thousand members are now pledged to give one-tenth of their income for the extension of the kingdom. But it is the latter part of the pledge, combined with the first, that has laid hold of the divine resources. Twenty-four thousand women are members of the League of Intercessors and are praying for the dedication of life and means for this world task, and for continued benediction on the work of their hands.

Publications. — The Publication Office has made a record of more than fifty years of self-support. Millions of pages of programs, leaflets, and demonstrations leave its presses annually. The Woman's Missionary Friend and the Junior Friend have made a combined gain, in the last six months, of 1,583 subscribers, making 156,391 subscriptions.

2. THE JUBILEE

Fiftieth anniversary.—

The Society celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in Boston in 1919. Goals had been set in 1914, when, in the midst of lowering war clouds, uncertainty as to procedure and policy, perils by sea and in foreign lands, the women felt acutely the need of advance in order to meet the world needs and conditions. More keenly did they feel the need of united and definite prayer, so the League of Intercessors was formed, the members pledging themselves "to give time from day to day to quiet, unhurried thoughts about God and his world-wide purpose, and to definite prayer for the progress of his kingdom."

The women then set themselves to the task of reaching these goals:

"One thousand missionaries on Jubilee Roll;

"Four hundred thousand members;

"Two hundred thousand subscribers to our periodicals;

"Sixteen hundred thousand dollars in 1919 for the conquest."

These goals were met. How Mother Parker's heart must have rejoiced as she sat on the platform at Boston and heard that the Society she had helped to organize had sent to the women of other lands, 1,087 missionaries whose service totaled 5,965 years; that receipts for the year represented 501 times the amount collected in 1869, and that the membership had grown from eight to 459,498! Mother Parker still has occasion for gratitude as each report finds her in her Indian home.

V. FIELD ACTIVITIES

1. EVANGELISTIC

The Society's evangelistic campaign in 1920 secured thirteen new evangelistic missionaries; support for 200 new Bible women; a building fund of $122,170; literature for all the Oriental lands and provision for itinerating our evangelists.

The task of our evangelists is challenging and tremendous. Centuries of isolation, of ignorance, and of suppression still weigh upon the native Christian women. There are 500,000 more men than women in the native Methodist churches. "The home, and not the individual is the unit of the church" and the church can not fulfill its proper mission until the women are an evangelising agency within their own families and communities.

Summary of evangelistic achievement:

Bible Training Schools.....	36, Enrolment	850
Bible Training Institutes.....	375, Enrolment	9,407
Bible women		2,631
Women under instruction		242,723
Women and girls baptized in 1922.....		20,715

2. EDUCATIONAL

a. "Children's Year."—This year has been Children's Year. The 2,000 little tots in kindergartens, the more than 34,000 little girls in our primaries, and the un-privileged children of our village day schools have been the special objects of prayers and gifts. The Society is striving to create the ideals of the coming generation, but it is able to touch only a fringe. There are 70,000,000 children of school age in China, and only 4,000,000 of them in schools of any kind. Of these there are ninety-six boys to four girls in the lower primary grades and ninety-five to five in the higher primary. "This startling discrepancy indicates the greatest lack in Chinese public education and the place where help from the Christian movement is most needed." A challenge to the Christian womanhood of America!

In India, where the masses are turning to the Christian church, and where our own denomination baptized 136,000 last year, 100,000 Methodist children have no school privileges. We must not raise an illiterate church. We have at present 983 village schools in India and Burma. It is the purpose of the Society to increase such schools, to standardize and better equip them, and to lift, by vocational training, the economic status of those who attend.

b. "High School Year." — The year 1923-24 has been set apart for special emphasis on high, normal, and vocational training schools. In these an army of native teachers will be trained for elementary schools. The high schools supply not only the students who enter college but also those greater numbers who enter immediately into professional or home life. In one high school seventy-nine girls were baptized this year. In another all but two pupils are Christians. The teachers realize, as one writes, "Our first business is to love these girls into a knowledge of Christ." And this does not involve loss of scholarship!

The industrial woman.—More and more girls and women must be prepared to be economic factors by reason of what they can do. Otherwise there must continue to be child wives and girl widows. The increasing number of those who are being exploited as mine and factory workers, under intolerable conditions must likewise receive an intelligent ministry. The Society hopes to provide settlement houses, social workers, and hostels to meet this new phase of work among women. In many cases, employers welcome such service. The factory owners of Cawnpore have offered to finance a system of schools for the hundreds of children of employees if the Society will but provide an experienced teacher to organize and oversee the work.

3. MEDICAL

The recent medical campaign yielded $234,468, four new doctors, eleven nurses, four heating plants, four lighting plants, seven isolation wards, and supplies to the value of $30,000. There is still need, in our hospitals, for doctors, nurses, technicians, dietitians, business managers, libraries, instruments, supplies of every sort. Twenty are in operation with a total staff of 438, twenty-seven of whom are missionary doctors, matched by an equal number of native women physicians. These hospitals ministered last year to more than 260,000 patients, giving them the "Christ treatment," as a grateful patient said, as well as the most scientific medical care.

But the tragic physical need of the women of the East can never be met except by rapidly increasing the number of native doctors and trained nurses. The next imperative task is to strengthen, staff and equip the North China Medical School, which, in spite of every handicap, has sent out trained Christian graduates who are helping to save the loss as well as the lost. One half the babies in China die before they are a year old. There are but ninety-three women physicians in China to 200,000,000 women. The Vellore Medical School in India is training its girls not only in medical science but in social service among the outcastes.

The Society hopes, through community nurses, training in the schools, popular literature, pictures, lectures, and public demonstrations to lessen the mortality by epidemics, plagues, tuberculosis and preventable diseases. "Itinerant dispensaries" are needed to accompany evangelists into the villages, and malnutrition must be offset by the teaching of food conservation and domestic science adapted to the life of the East.

VI. THE ADVANCE PROGRAM

1. FOR THE FOREIGN FIELD

Opportunities are varied and endless. The advance program contemplates work along usual lines but with new emphasis on the creation of native literature and on the development of native support and leadership. Schools in Manchuria; co-operation in college work in West China; establishment of a social center in Tokyo; and in Seoul; a hostel for students in Sofia;

Phulmoni-bai, the first pupil in the Johnson Girls' High School of our mission at Jubbulpore, India—Shown here with two of her daughters housing of seventy-five existing day schools in West China; participation in North China Medical School; entirely new plant for school of more than two hundred at Nagasaki; community house with kindergarten at Hakodate, Japan; kindergartens for hundreds of eager little Korean "kiddies" (we have 800 in schools in one city alone); high school at Kong Ju which will minister to one-third of Methodist population of Korea; new plant at Bombay, hostel for normal at Godhra, India; Edith Jackson Memorial at Darjeeling; patients' hostel in Baroda, India; enlarged plant in Lovetch, Bulgaria; dispensaries and industrial equipment for Africa; new building for overcrowded school in Lima, Peru; scholarship fund for advance work of promising graduates; adequate salaries for trained nationals; increased endowment for our retired missionaries—these are among the new projects under consideration. Better housing for our missionaries, prevention of disease, public health programs are to receive increased emphasis.

2. FOR THE HOME BASE

The advance program on the home base contemplates for each year not less than a ten per cent increase in members, subscribers, tithers, intercessors, and money. It aims also at erasing the words "daughterless" and "childless" from before auxiliaries in churches which now have no organization for the training of children and young people through the Little Light Bearers, King's Heralds, Standard Bearers, and Young Women's organizations. A new group which promises much for the future of both the foreign and the home societies, is the Wesleyan Service Guild, an organization of business and professional women, affiliated with both societies. In some one of these groups there is a place for every Methodist woman and child to assist in carrying the good news to the "uttermost parts." Forty-eight missionaries are supported by the children's organizations. Even shut-ins and those who live where they can join no auxiliary, may have a share in this work, through Extension circles. There are 30,000 Extension members; and they support thirty-three missionaries.

3. THE CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS

The present field force:

Missionaries in active service.....	677
New missionaries sent out, 1922.....	77
New missionaries accepted, 1922.....	90
Native workers in all departments.....	5,000

Recruits needed at home and afield.—The Society pleads for more members, more tithers, more intercessors. A French writer has said, "American women are the most favored in the world, and also the most selfish." May it not be said of American Methodist women! Even so, if they give to the world the best they have, the best comes back to them. Commitment to such a world task lifts one's horizon, challenges one's latent talents, increases one's fellowship with choice spirits and makes one a co-worker with the Lord of the harvest.

The Society imperatively needs more than consecration of time and means on the part of women at home. It needs the giving of life itself in investment which promises greatest possible returns.

Mother dead, father unloving, Sundni was drifting on the streets of Bowringpet, India, when your missionary found her Trained, consecrated Christian women to go as teachers, social workers, supervisors, doctors, nurses, evangelists—these are its constant and crying need. Two hundred and seventy-nine women are an immediate, specific need.

The task.—Seventy-five million women in foreign lands have been assigned to Methodist women as their "responsibility." The task of evangelizing them is humanly impossible, but is slowly being achieved through the power of prayer and of consecrated lives. Help is coming from unreckoned sources. Every Methodist church in Denmark has an auxiliary; Finland reports 800 members; and Sweden, 6,000. Bulgarian churches are well organized and publish their own Woman's Foreign Missionary Society paper. Three thousand and eighty-three women in the Orient desiring to bear witness to the uttermost parts, have joined the Society. "He hath set the world in their hearts." They are lifting themselves beyond the bounds of racialism and nationalism into sympathy with the common needs of humanity. They are using the Society's study books; teaching their children world friendship; supporting scholarships in Africa; sending Christmas boxes to new fields; filling mite boxes and bringing out of their penury tithes and thank-offerings in order to extend to other lands the blessings Christ has brought to them. This is the true genius of Christianity. Could there be a finer bond of international understanding than this common purpose to make known to all the earth Him who prayed that His followers should be "one"?

MARY A. LATHBURY

WOMAN'S HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY

1. HISTORICAL AND LEGAL

1. ORIGIN AND AIM

The Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1880 in Trinity Church, Cincinnati, Ohio. Its aim is stated in the constitution of the Society: "To enlist and organize the interest of Christian women in behalf of the needy and destitute in all sections of our country."

2. MANAGEMENT

The work of the Society is managed by a Board of Trustees who are elected annually by a Board of Managers, itself composed of representatives from the various units of the organization.

3. FINANCES

The funds of the Woman's Home Missionary Society are secured through its constituency which is organized into units for women, young people, and children. In addition to the dues paid by members, the local organizations pledge to raise other sums which may be needed for the promotion of the work.

Special gifts from individuals are received through the regular channels of the organization.

The organization is permitted to present its work to the public congregation once each year, and this public meeting is frequently the opportunity for thank offering collections, the proceeds of which are applied to the payment of missionary salaries.

II. SCOPE OF ACTIVITIES

1. SCHOOLS

The Woman's Home Missionary Society has established schools for Negroes, Indians, Eskimos, Orientals, Mexicans, and also for whites in those localities where educational opportunity is otherwise lacking. It is significant that America, supposedly one of the most civilized nations in the world, stands eleventh in the line of literacy. Ten of the leading nations of the world have less illiteracy than has the United States!

2. ORPHANAGES AND HOMES

The Society has erected orphanages; homes for girls whose wages are inadequate to provide them wholesome quarters elsewhere (Esther and Friendship Homes); hospitals and dispensaries; day nurseries; kindergartens; city missions; houses of refuge and protection for immigrants at our ports of entry; and training schools for those who wish to prepare for life service in the home land or in foreign fields.

3. DEACONESSES

In all the great cities of our land, deaconesses of the Woman's Home Missionary Society serve as "Travelers' Aids," as nurses, as pastor's assistants, as teachers, as preachers, and as general burden-bearers.

4. SUPPLIES

Through the Department of Supplies, the Society carries aid to frontier churches and to the poor and needy everywhere. Had it not been for the aid received through this Supply Department, many preachers in the far West could not have remained on their charges.

5. WORK FOR YOUNG PEOPLE

Through its organizations for young people and children, this Society assists in the training of an army of Methodist young people to carry the ideals of Christ into the daily living of thousands of American families.

III. INSTITUTIONS OF THE SOCIETY institutions such as children's homes, settlements and kindergartens under the control of the local conference organizations.

IV. REPORT OF PROGRESS

1. MEMBERSHIP

At the annual meeting of the Woman's Home Missionary Society in Pittsburgh, October, 1922, it was reported that ninety conferences were organized for home missionary work, with the following membership:

Adults or auxiliary.....	256,282
Young people	66,815
Children	122,396

Total445,493

These figures show a total net gain of 17,334 members over the report of the preceding year.

2. FIELD WORKERS

The forces on the field are:

Missionaries	550
Deaconesses	468
Associate workers	44

3. STUDENTS

The students in the homes and schools number 6,267. Those who receive the ministry of settlements through deaconesses and community workers number many thousands more.

4. BUILDINGS

Under our five-year building program, one new building has been completed at

G. O. Robinson Girls' Orphanage,
San Juan, P. R.

each of the following National Training Schools:

California, San Francisco—San Francisco Training School.

Iowa, Des Moines—Iowa Bible.

Missouri, Kansas City—Kansas City Training School.

New York, Herkimer—Folts Mission Institute.

In addition to these, Thayer Home, Atlanta, Georgia, the Society's first Industrial Home in the Southland, has been entirely made over and enlarged. This is located on Clark University campus. The Training School for Negro Young Women will be housed there in the early fall.

A Community House at Leisingring, Pennsylvania, among Slavonic people not only aids the betterment of the mining community, but also gives opportunity for training in Christian social service to the young women of our McCrum Slavonic Training School at Uniontown, Pennsylvania.

The Frances De Pauw Home and School, one of the industrial institutions for Spanish-American girls has completed a new building which has doubled the capacity of the home. The bishop who dedicated this splendid building said, "It is a bridge into Old Mexico."

The Rose Gregory Houchen Settlement House for young people and children in El Paso, Texas, has added another property and building for the dispensary and clinic.

The Gertrude Orvis Hall, San Turce, Porto Rico, has recently been dedicated. The new building at the Susannah Wesley Home, Honolulu, also has been completed.

The hospital at Nome, Alaska, is completed and ministers comfort to many in that far-away land.

The school house at the Navajo Indian Mission, Farmington, New Mexico, provides better educational facilities for the Navajo children of whom several thousand are reached by no school at all.

The E. L. Rust Industrial School for Negro girls has been enlarged to provide room for additional pupils.

The Administration Building at Mitchell Home, Misenheimer, North Carolina, is now being built at an approximate cost of $75,000 and will be an asset to the entire community. This institution is for the Southern Highlanders.

Spurlock Hall is a much needed addition to the Mother's Jewels Home, York, Nebraska, our largest orphanage.

Sager-Brown Orphanage for Negro children is at last a fulfillment of the South's long and earnest desire to help these needy children, and was made possible at this time by the transfer of property by the Board of Education for Negroes.

Many buildings have been erected, purchased or received by special gift for local conference work. The maintenance of these institutions is authorized and approved by the national Woman's Home Missionary Society.

Kindergarten at Bingham Canyon, Utah

The new buildings which will be completed before the close of this building campaign are the following:

Alaska, Unalaska—Jesse Lee Home, hospital and chapel.

Florida, Jacksonville—Brewster Hospital for Negroes.

Georgia, Cedartown—McCarty Home.

Illinois, Chicago—Marcy Center.

Illinois, Polo—Peek Orphanage, Shumway Cottage.

Indiana, Gary—Campbell Settlement.

Iowa, Keokuk—Graham Hospital.

Kentucky, Olive Hill—Erie Home for Mountaineers.

Louisiana, Basile—Evangeline College.

New Mexico, Albuquerque—Methodist Deaconess Sanitarium.

New York, Tivoli—Watts DePeyster Recreational Hall.

Oregon, Portland—Portland Industrial Center.

Pennsylvania, Philadelphia—Philadelphia Deaconess Home.

Tullalip Indian Reservation Community House.

Wisconsin, Odanah—Indian Mission House.

Virginia, Lynchburg—Negro Girls' Seminary.

Carrie Barge Negro Orphanage.

In addition to these buildings for which funds are being accumulated by the national organization, several local conference buildings have been approved. The Methodist Deaconess Hospital, Rapid City, South Dakota, a number of Esther and Friendship Homes which furnish a safe Christian home for young women who receive a small wage, and Community Houses are to be erected and controlled by conference organizations which will furnish milk stations, dispensaries, day nurseries, kitchengartens, kindergartens, recreation and playgrounds, besides many activities which may be helpful in the life of the community.

V. ADVANCE PROGRAM

To carry out the plans laid for 1922 and 1923 the Society needs a twenty per cent increase over its receipts of the year 1921-22. All nationalities in the home land receive this helpful uplift which makes for Christian citizenship. The Society believes that in the evangelization of the world, a large part must be played by Christian America. The example of America among the nations as illiterate, indifferent to the teachings of Christ, fostering racial and national antagonisms, growing richer every day regardless of the poverty among the nations and within its own borders—the example of such an America is a hindrance to the evangelization of the world.

INTRODUCING THE FINANCIAL NEEDS

In order that the members of our church may have first-hand knowledge regarding the financial activities of the boards and commissions which are beneficiaries of the Centenary Fund, a detailed statement appears on the following pages. The reports cover the operations of the last fiscal year of each of our benevolent organizations.

The first statement shows the receipts and disbursements of the Treasurer of the Committee on Conservation and Advance which is succeeded by a report of the expenditures of the Committee on Conservation and Advance. Thereafter appear the receipts and disbursements of the various benevolent organizations. To complete the report, the financial statements of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society and the Woman's Home Missionary Society are also included. These two organizations raise and disburse their own funds and are not beneficiaries of the Centenary. For the purpose of making it possible to visualize quickly the proportion of amount expended under various headings, each statement is followed by a graphic representation.

Each statement, except those of the women's organizations, has been carefully annotated so that a reader may be able to understand the purpose for which the funds were disbursed.

An effort has been made to employ a uniform classification for disbursements. However, it has been difficult to achieve a satisfactory result because of the lack of a uniform system of accounting in the boards. This is the first attempt at a classification of expenditures; it is hoped that in the future a more satisfactory result may be obtained. The classification covering the disbursements of the boards has been prepared by their treasurers.

It will be observed that the fiscal years of the boards vary. Hence the amount shown under disbursements of the Committee on Conservation and Advance will not harmonize with the amount of receipts by boards. Furthermore, several of the boards have sources of income aside from the receipts from the Committee on Conservation and Advance. The American Bible Society, which is an interdenominational organization, also receives support from other Protestant communions.

The question of overhead expenses is frequently raised by interested donors. In the report of the Committee on Conservation and Advance the expenses are divided into two general divisions: Administration, and Education and Promotion. Administration covers the general organization of the office under the direction of the corresponding secretary and the treasurer. Under Education and Promotion are listed all the salaries and traveling expenses of those who are giving their time to education in the field. Also the work of publicity and the manufacture and distribution of lantern slides. The conclusion can easily be reached that the activities of the Committee on Conservation and Advance are wholly for the purpose of educating the Church concerning its benevolent work.

It should also be stated that the aim of several of the boards is almost wholly educational. Hence, appropriations for missionary work are small. Among these are included the Board of Sunday Schools; the Board of the Epworth League; the Board of Conference Claimants; the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals; the General Deaconess Board; the Board of Hospitals and Homes; the Commission on Courses of Study; and the Commission on Life Service.

The Board of Foreign Missions, the Board of Home Missions and Church Extension, the Board of Education, the Board of Education for Negroes, and the American Bible Society, in addition to their expenses for administration, promotion, and education, make large appropriations to missionary work.

In all of the statements submitted, an effort has been made to classify overhead under administration; and yet the result has been far from satisfactory because in any system of accounting it is not possible to introduce sufficient details to classify every expenditure. In the minds of some, education and promotion may be considered overhead. If so this amount should be added to administration. However, if every local church would accept the responsibility of keeping its members and constituents informed concerning the benevolent program of our church, without any stimulation from without, the overhead would be reduced to a minimum. The percentage of overhead is determined by the missionary spirit which prevails in the local churches.

In the space available it has not been possible to supply complete details. If readers wish a more elaborate statement concerning the financial operations of any of the boards and commissions, a request by mail to any of the organizations will bring the information desired.

In the World Service Program each church will determine when the canvass for the disciplinary apportioned benevolences is to be made. No simultaneous campaign is planned and no outside financial agents will be employed.

It should be clearly understood that the World Service Program is not primarily a financial campaign. It is a clarion call to the local churches to strengthen themselves by evangelism and by the development of their lay activities in the local communities for service at home and abroad.

MORRIS W. EHNES,
Treasurer, Committee on Conservation and Advance.

Chicago, Illinois, May 15, 1923.

THE NO-GROWTH OR PRESENT-WORK BASIS

These amounts are absolutely necessary for the fiscal year, 1924-25, if the general benevolent boards are to carry on their work on the same basis as on January 1, 1923 or the fiscal year ending nearest that date. They are "no-growth" figures in the sense that, without the receipts indicated below, our World Service cannot have a greater expansion than it had during the last reported year, 1922.

AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY

The total needs revealed by the surveys within the scope of the American Bible Society led the Council of Boards of Benevolence, upon the recommendation of the Committee of Twenty-five and its Subcommittee on New Studies, to indicate $250,000 as the share of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the total budget of this society.

These needs are described in Parts One and Two of this volume and are classified as follows. It is not possible to make a separate analysis of our share in these total needs.

APPROPRIATIONS

Publication

Scriptures printed for the society's work in the United States and Latin America chiefly; paper and press work, binding, general manufacturing expenses, superintendence, care and repair of plates, Scriptures purchased, depository charges.

Home agency secretaries

Salaries of nine secretaries, and general office and travel expense.

Home agencies

Nine agencies including work among the Negro people throughout the United States, and appropriations for distribution of Scriptures in the fields.

Foreign agencies

Secretaries' salaries, twelve agencies, West Indies, Mexico, Caribbean, Upper Andes, La Plata, Brazil, Levant, Arabic-Levant, Philippines, Siam, China, Japan, and contingent expense.

Foreign agencies, covering Latin America, the Near East, and the Far East as already named; expenditures for the manufacture and purchase of Scriptures and the expense connected with their distribution by colporteurs and correspondents.

General

Extending life memberships and auxiliary Bible societies; providing Scriptures for the blind; miscellaneous home expenses, emergencies, and home grants in books or funds; miscellaneous foreign, furlough and traveling expenses, foreign agency secretaries, pensions, grants in funds or books to fields not included in agencies, countries in Europe, Asia, Africa, Micronesia, etc., and co-operative movements; translation and revision, and plates of new versions not charged in the cost of the books, and contingent.

ADMINISTRATION

General administration including salaries of two general secretaries, a treasurer, a recording secretary and an assistant secretary.

Salaries and wages of office force.

Travel, postage, telephone, telegraph and cables, supplies, and office equipment.

Bible Society Record, annual report, pamphlets and leaflets, library expenses, meeting of the Advisory Committee and contingent.

Treasurer's office, including bookkeeper and cashiers.

Pensions, interest on loans, legacy expenses, annuity expenses, payment of costs over income; capital charges, real estate (not Bible House in New York); audits and special accounts, United States Trust Co. as assistant treasurer and collections of checks.

EDUCATION AND PROMOTION

Salaries and wages, news releases, general advertisement, Bible Sunday, pamphlets, lantern slides, exhibits and posters; annuity program, following up donors and new prospects, and contingent expense.

BOARD OF TEMPERANCE, PROHIBITION, AND PUBLIC MORALS

The needs revealed by the surveys within the scope of the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals and approved by the Council of Boards of Benevolence, after careful scrutiny and revision by the Committee of Twenty-five and its Sub-committee on New Studies, are $316,750.00.

These needs are described in Parts One and Two of this volume and are classified as follows:

Surveys and Special Assistance.....	$ 10,000
For dealing with notorious situations in cases where investigation and advice are imperative, and the publication of reports for the basis for corrective legislation, publicity, court action, but not "law enforcement."
Printing and Propaganda.....	35,000
For the preparation, printing and circulation monthly of the Clipsheet and The Voice and certain publications to impress people of marked leadership and influence.
Research and Record	5,000
For the compilation with proper files and card indexes of the results of surveys and other data of value, for publicity addresses, college and university lectures and sociological study.
Charts and Illustrations.....	3,000.00
Illustrative material for Sunday-school lesson helps, plated cartoons for rural papers, charts for schools and posters for general propaganda.
Foreign Language Literature.....	16,000
For regular periodical publications in South America, Switzerland, Italy and India, also for posters, charts, leaflets in many foreign languages and for publicity material in the foreign-language press in the United States.
Lantern Slides and Moving Pictures.....	1,000
For the production and circulation of technical slides and popular and scientific motion picture films, especially for use among foreign-language groups.
Exhibits	15,000
For child welfare, expositions, fairs, occasional meetings both in America and abroad.
Appropriations for Foreign Work.....	45,000
For salaries, office and travel expense, and for education and propaganda work in South America, Austria, Hungary Germany, Baltic States, Switzerland, Italy, India, France, Mexico and Japan.
International Co-operation	10,000
For reasearch and propaganda at Lausanne, Switzerland, especially through the public press.
Mass Propaganda	100,000
For the preparation and distribution of vital pamphlets to every telephone subscriber in certain cities at critical times in the fight for prohibition.
General Administration	64,750
Salaries of corresponding secretary, field helpers, stenographers and clerks, postage, stationery, miscellaneous supplies, telephone, telegraph, rent, taxes, and insurance.
Travel	15,000
Travel and hotel expense of the secretaries in the United States and for occasional visits to foreign fields and the travel of certain foreign secretaries.
TOTAL NEEDS	$319,750

GENERAL DEACONESS BOARD

The needs revealed by the surveys within the scope of the General Deaconess Board and approved by the Council of Boards of Benevolence, after careful scrutiny and revision by the Committee of Twenty-five and its Sub-committee on New Studies, are $90,000.00.

These needs are described in Parts One and Two of this volume and are classified as follows:

Informing the Church	$ 14,100
Salaries, share of office rent, necessary travel expense, printing, clerical help, postage and lantern slides.
Securing Candidates	6,600
Salaries, share of office rent, travel expense, clerical help, postage, and for co-operation with the Life Service Commission.
Training Candidates	3,500
Share of office rent, travel expense, clerical help and postage, for raising the standards of instruction in training schools.
Scholarships	8,000
Available for a limited number of young women of unusual promise.
Rest Homes and Pensions.....	30,600
Grants in aid to rest homes and pensions for retired deaconesses, with share of general office expense.
Administration	27,200
Salaries of corresponding secretary, field workers and office force, travel and general office expense, and travel and hotel expense of the members of the board for the annual and other meetings.
TOTAL NEEDS.....	$ 90,000

BOARD OF HOSPITALS AND HOMES

The needs revealed by the surveys within the scope of the Board of Hospitals and Homes and approved by the Council of Boards of Benevolence, after careful scrutiny and revision by the Committee of Twenty-five and its Sub-committees on New Studies are $175,000.

The needs are described in Parts One and Two of this volume and are classified as follows:

Field Promotion	$ 27,000
For salaries, travel and office expense for the corresponding secretary, field secretaries, director of finance, department of architecture, department of American White Cross and the promotion of child welfare.
Administration	18,000
For salaries of the office secretary, stenographers and bookkeeper, rent, office supplies and equipment, postage, telegraph, telephone, legal advice and travel and hotel expense of board members for annual meeting and its committees.
Publicity	5,000
For printing and distributing the technical pamphlets of the board and the News Letter sent to all institutions and to the leaders of the church, slides, graphs, charts, and for publicity counsel to local institutions.
Maintenance of National Institutions.....	100,000
To apply on the current expenses of institutions that have a claim on the general church due to the peculiar character of their service; including the National Methodist Sanatorium for Tuberculosis, Colorado Springs, Colorado; the Methodist Deaconess Sanatorium for Tuberculosis at Albuquerque, New Mexico; the Home for Retired Ministers at Eustis, Florida, and for the care of our patients at homes for incurables (the location of a National Methodist Home for Incurables is now pending).
Emergency Loans and Grants.....	25,000
For the assistance of hospitals and homes in financial stringency where no local help can be obtained.
TOTAL NEEDS.....	$175,000

COMMISSION ON COURSES OF STUDY

The needs revealed by the surveys within the scope of the Commission on Courses of Study and approved by the Council of Boards of Benevolence, after careful scrutiny and revision by the Committee of Twenty-five and its Sub-committees on New Studies are $60,000.

These needs are described in Parts One and Two of this volume and are classified as follows:

The salaries of the Executive Secretary, staff directors, stenographers and filing clerks, rent, postage, telegraph, telephone and other office expense required for the following divisions of work.

- (1) For prescribing the courses of study for those applying for license to preach, for local preachers, for reception on trial, for annual conference requirements, correspondence study and postgraduate study.
- (2) For co-operation with the conference boards of examiners for such assistance as may be desired in directing and aiding students in their study and in plans and methods of examination.
- (3) For the summer schools of theology held under the control of the conference boards of examiners. Each school is held on the campus of one of our colleges or seminaries, and every undergraduate is required to be in attendance. The conference examiner is the instructor. Examinations and credits are given and diplomas are issued to successful students.
- (4) For the preparation and promotion of a graduate course of study, textbooks, manuals and collateral reading and for correspondence and supervision.

COMMISSION ON LIFE SERVICE

The needs revealed by the surveys within the scope of the Commission on Life Service and approved by the Council of Boards of Benevolence, after careful scrutiny and revision by the Committee of Twenty-five and its Sub-committees on New Studies are $75,000.

These needs are described in Parts One and Two of this volume and are classified as follows:

The salaries of the executive secretary, staff directors, stenographers and filing clerks, rent, postage, telegram, telephone and other office expense required for the following divisions of work$75,000

- (1) For the correlation of the life service appeals of all the agencies of the church.
- (2) For conferences with faculties, Christian Association secretaries, pastors and students in Methodist and non-Methodist secondary schools, colleges, universities and professional schools, in order to secure definite decisions for full time Christian work.
- (3) For registering, filing and making available to bishops, district superintendents and all boards, detailed information regarding recruits and candidates who are preparing for life service.
- (4) For correspondence with candidates on matters of vocational guidance and educational requirements for preparation for different phases of life work.
- (5) For preparing and distributing general information regarding opportunities for life work within the church including specific opportunities which open from time to time.
- (6) For research and continuous surveys in order to forecast the personnel needs over a period of years.

COMMITTEE ON CONSERVATION AND ADVANCE

The needs of the Committee on Conservation and Advance, as approved by the Council of Boards of Benevolence after careful scrutiny and revision by the Committee of Twenty-five and the Sub-Committee on New Studies, are $865,000.00.

These needs represent the necessary expansion of the activities described on the askings for the present work basis as found on Page 672.

The future budget of the Committee on Conservation and Advance depends entirely on the amount of education and promotion which the church desires from a central promotional agency. Any modification of the work from the present basis would result either in added expense to the benevolent boards or in the elimination of types and divisions of work.

TOTAL NEEDS$865,000

THE APPORTIONMENT TO THE CHURCHES

A minimum requirement for maintaining our World Service on the present basis of expansion (January 1, 1923), demands $13,885,231.77. The total needs revealed in the surveys and approved by the Council of Boards of Benevolence call for an expenditure of $28,045,173.00. Midway between these minimum and maximum figures the Council voted to apportion to the churches, $18,500,000, distributed among the various boards as follows:

Board of Foreign Missions.....	$ 6,800,000
Board of Home Missions and Church Extension	6,800,000
Board of Education for Negroes.....	760,000
Board of Education.....	1,500,000
Board of Sunday Schools.....	600,000
Board of Conference Claimants.....	150,000
Board of the Epworth League.....	175,000
American Bible Society.....	200,000
Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals.....	250,000
General Deaconess Board.....	90,000
Board of Hospitals and Homes.....	175,000
Commission on Courses of Study.....	60,000
Commission on Life Service.....	75,000
Committee on Conservation and Advance	865,000
	$18,500,000

In the World Service Program, the income of no board is guaranteed: all share in the receipts in proportion to the askings listed above, with the exception of the Committee on Conservation and Advance, for which the income is necessarily guaranteed.

HOW THE APPORTIONMENTS ARE MADE

The apportionments are a goal, a standard which must be met if the work which the church has undertaken is to be successfully carried through. They are not a demand arbitrarily imposed upon the church from without. They are rather an attempt, by the agency which the church itself has established for this purpose, to distribute fairly throughout the whole church the opportunity and the responsibility for the support of its general benevolent activities. A perfect apportionment, if such could be made, would do no more than register the figure which each church, if it might study for itself and know the whole matter in detail, would recognize and accept as its just share in the whole task. When so accepted, the benevolence apportionments afford a reasonable ground for the expectation that certain needed amounts of money will be provided for our varied missionary and philanthropic undertakings.

The problem of the apportionments is two-fold. First, some way must be found equitably to distribute the whole task to the larger units of which the church is composed, that is, to the several conferences, mission conferences, and missions. This distribution must be made by some central, authoritative, co-ordinating body. Second, some way must be found to distribute to the pastoral charges in each conference the total responsibility of the conference. Any distribution to these smaller units which the central authority may make ought to be subject to whatever revision may be required to meet various local conditions concerning which no central organization can have exact and intimate knowledge. This calls for the co-operation of local groups having close and familiar contact with small sections of the church—such as the district superintendent and the district committee on apportionments. The central agency ought to exercise no further control over this redistribution than is needed in order to preserve certain approved totals.

How the new plan of apportionments adopted for the World Service Program attempts to meet this two-fold problem is set forth in the following paragraphs.

APPORTIONMENTS TO CONFERENCES

The annual conferences, mission conferences, and missions are rated according to their ability to give. Their relative standing in this matter has been determined by three factors:

1. The number of members per pastoral charge.—As a rule, the larger the average number of members in the pastoral charges of any conference, the stronger the conference and the greater the ability of its people to give.

2. The ministerial support payment per pastoral charge.—As a rule, the larger this item, the stronger the conference and the greater the financial resources of its people.

3. The per capita payment to ministerial support.—Other things being equal, the larger the individual contribution for ministerial support, the stronger the conference and the greater the ability of its people to give.

The number of members is always understood in these reckonings to mean the number of full members, not including preparatory or non-resident members. By ministerial support is meant, as defined by the Discipline, pastors' salaries (house rent included), and payments for the support of district superintendents, bishops, and conference claimants.

The 113 conferences to which apportionments are made are rated according to these three items. The average for the country as a whole on each item is first ascertained, and with it is compared the average on the same item for each annual conference. To find the relative standing of an annual conference as to the number of members per pastoral charge, it is necessary to compare it with the average number of members per pastoral charge in the country as a whole. This is indicated by an index or rating of 100. The rating is then calculated for each conference. If the average number of members per pastoral charge in any conference is above the average for the country as a whole, that conference must accordingly be rated at above 100. If the average number of members per pastoral charge in any conference is less than the average for the country as a whole, that conference must accordingly be rated at less than 100.

By an exactly similar process the relative standing as to each of the other two items is calculated, in each case the conference being compared with the church as a whole. The average of the three index numbers so calculated, determines the rating of the conference, just as the average credit earned by a pupil in his various classes determines his standing in school. For instance, a certain conference has 54 per cent as many members in each pastoral charge as the average number of members per pastoral charge in the United States, it pays 78 per cent as much to ministerial support per pastoral charge, and 147 per cent as much per member as the average payment of the church as a whole. The average of these three percentages is 93. This conference therefore is counted as able to pay about 90 per cent as much per member as a conference of average ability.

These estimates of the relative ability to give have further been verified and corrected by comparison with the relative income per capita in each state as calculated by the National Bureau of Economic Research. When, for example, it was found that the per capita income in the state in which the conference above cited is located is exactly 93 per cent of the average income per capita in the whole United States, the estimate of the Division of Apportionments and Statistics on the comparative financial ability of this conference had received the strongest possible confirmation. In most cases comparison with these scientific estimates of income clearly confirms the division's rating of the several conferences; in other cases this comparison has been used to modify and correct its estimates of comparative financial ability, not in any case increasing, but in a few instances lowering. Comparison was also made with the relative apportionment per member for the Centenary and the relative payment per member in each conference.

The total amount ordered to be apportioned to the whole church is apportioned to the several conferences on the basis of the estimates so made of comparative ability to give.

A detailed statement of the methods employed, including the rating of the several conferences and the amount to be apportioned to each conference, was submitted to the administrative committee of the Committee on Conservation and Advance, acting under the authority of the Council of Boards; and these methods, estimates, and apportionments received the administrative committee's definite approval.

APPORTIONMENTS TO PASTORAL CHARGES

Thus far this statement has dealt only with the apportionment to each conference as a whole. The next step is to distribute these conference totals to pastoral charges, assigning to each charge its just share in the total amount apportioned to the annual conference. A careful estimate must first be made of the comparative strength of the several congregations in each conference as indicated by the statistics printed annually for all charges.

Four items in these statistical reports are accepted as in some degree an indication of each congregation's ability to give to the church's benevolent program. These items are:

1. Membership, the number of full members on the roll, not including either preparatory or non-resident members.
2. Net property valuation, churches and parsonages, less indebtedness on property.

3. Ministerial support, pastors' salaries (house rent included) and payments to the support of district superintendents, bishops, and conference claimants.

4. Previous payments to disciplinary benevolences, Centenary payments for the ten general benevolent boards and the American Bible Society, together with the Children's Day Loan Fund of the Board of Education and the women's missionary societies.

In order to provide a more adequate measure of each church's normal strength, not one year's statistical report alone, but the average of three full Centenary years is used in all these reckonings.

Expensive properties reported by churches wholly supported from missionary funds are excluded from the reckoning; and properties of small, partially self-supporting churches are counted as no more than the average property holding per member in the church as a whole. The attempt is also made to exclude from the reckoning money received from any missionary agency and applied to ministerial support.

REDISTRIBUTION OF APPORTIONMENTS

After the above processes have been employed and the apportionments to the local churches have been calculated, these apportionments are mailed to the district superintendents as required by the Discipline. They in turn are expected to "transmit the same to pastors," not however without first the opportunity to secure, if needed, some revision. For, no matter how excellent the methods employed or how accurately they may have been applied, still a perfect result will not in all cases have been achieved.

Therefore, whenever desirable, the district superintendent is authorized to redistribute, in co-operation with a district committee on apportionments, the total amount apportioned to his district. This makes it possible through district co-operation to overcome the most serious difficulty which a central organization must meet in any attempt to calculate the apportionments to the local churches.

No redistribution can be accepted by which the district total is reduced.

After the district superintendent has reported to the central office the redistribution recommended by the district committee, and after these figures are found to meet the conditions stated above, they are recorded at the central office as the official apportionments to pastoral charges.

The apportionments are transmitted to local churches by the district superintendents, and will not be sent out directly from the central office.

The apportionments to the conferences, districts, and charges are calculated and are announced for one year and for only one year at a time. One apportionment is made distributing to conferences, districts and charges an $18,500,000 total. Separate apportionments are not reckoned for the individual boards.

DESIGNATED GIFTS

At its regular meeting in Chicago, January 23-25, 1923, the Council of Boards of Benevolence upon the recommendation of a subcommittee and its Executive Committee passed the following resolutions to govern designated gifts.

While it is the earnest hope of all the boards and agencies, that subscriptions and payments to the World Service Program be made regularly through the duplex envelope without designation, it is realized that many persons desire to give large amounts for specific objects. Fortunately, the financial plans of the World Service Program permit full opportunity to realize both of these desires.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE COUNCIL

1. The first consideration for the church is to raise the regular apportionment in full, so that the regular recurring obligations of its World Service may be faithfully provided for.

2. The Committee on Conservation and Advance, through its Administrative Committee, shall in consultation with the Boards make a list of approved needs for designated gifts. This list shall represent such portion of the work shown in the statement of needs in excess of the $18,500,000 regularly apportioned as may be determined upon. Additional or "honor roll" credit shall be given the churches only for such designated gifts as are authorized as herein provided.

3. Within the regular apportionments to the churches, contributors may designate their gifts to any board or to any of the objects of the work of any boards;

but such designation shall not change the ratio of receipts of the respective boards.

4. Authorized designated gifts from churches having met their apportionment in full shall be applied directly to the boards or causes designated, and shall be additional income for such boards. But all designated gifts shall bear their proportion of administration expenses.

5. When a church shall have raised its regular apportionment in full, it may receive additional or "honor roll" credit for all moneys given for authorized designated gifts.

6. To avoid conflicts, overlapping and duplication of expense and effort, all solicitation for designated gifts shall be under the immediate direction of the Committee on Conservation and Advance in co-operation with the other constituted authorities of the Church.

7. The Treasurers of the several constituent boards shall make an itemized monthly statement to the Treasurer of the Committee on Conservation and Advance of the receipt of all designated funds received by such board during the preceding month.

8. None of the donors of designated gifts shall receive apportionment or "honor roll" credit unless the moneys pass through the hands of the Treasurer of the Committee on Conservation and Advance or are reported as above.

9. These regulations relating to Designated Gifts shall continue in force until modified by the General Conference or by the Council of Boards of Benevolence.

The Committee of Twenty-Five and the Corresponding Secretaries in Session at Chicago, January 11-12, 1923

ADVANCE PROGRAM

Report of the Committee of Twenty-Five to the Council of Boards of Benevolence

Adopted by the Council at its meeting in Chicago, January 23-25, 1923

The Council of Boards of Benevolence at its second annual meeting in Detroit, Michigan, November 22, 1921, adopted a report recommending the creation of a Committee of Twenty-Five to which the boards should submit new studies of their needs as a basis for a program of advance for presentation to this Council.

This Committee of Twenty-Five on Advance Program was composed of fifteen ministers and ten laymen, with whom were associated the president of the Council, the chairman of the Executive Committee, the chairman, corresponding secretary, and treasurer of the Committee on Conservation and Advance, and the five members of the Bishops' Advisory Committee. It met in Chicago March 1-2, 1922, for organization. David G. Downey was elected chairman and James R. Joy, secretary. Standing committees were appointed on new studies, evangelism, educational program, stewardship, lay activities, and tentative program of advance. Plans for the prompt prosecution of the new studies by the boards were formulated, and a time schedule was worked out. The committee held a second meeting in Chicago June 27, 1922, when reports of progress in the surveys were received. The third session was held in Chicago, January 11-12, 1923. At this time the committee received and acted upon the results of the new studies and adopted the several reports which it now presents to the Council:

1. LAY ACTIVITIES

Your committee would emphasize the importance of lay activities in connection with the forward progress of church benevolences. Key laymen should be enlisted to make intelligent distribution of the new survey volume, to direct the every-member benevolent canvass and to otherwise educate and direct the local churches in the forward program.

We emphasize the importance of selection of the proper person in every quarterly conference as chairman of the committee on apportioned benevolences.

The missionary societies in the Sunday school, and the department of World Evangelism in the Epworth League should be enlisted for the best possible service in the new program.

In the work of promotion and education through the committee on apportioned benevolences, Sunday-school missionary societies, Epworth League department of World Evangelism, and other lay agencies we request our educational department of the Committee on Conservation and Advance to take necessary steps in making these agencies effective through the regular channels of the church.

We recommend the use of district or sub-district training conferences with lay representation to be arranged through the resident bishop, area secretary, and district superintendent.

2. EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM

We recommend that the existing organization of the church be the agency for the carrying out of this educational program and that the direction of it be committed to the Committee on Conservation and Advance, working through its Department of Education.

This action placing responsibility for the educational program on the existing organization of the church means that all the persons involved in this organization must themselves be informed and inspired as a prerequisite for leading the church to whole-hearted effort.

The suggestions which follow are based on the use of these connectional agencies:

a. An inter-board staff training conference, to be held immediately after the January council meeting.

b. An adequate presentation and discussion in the annual conferences, beginning with the spring conferences of 1923.

c. Area training conferences, with bishop, area secretary, college presidents, and district superintendents present.

d. District or group meetings using the Survey Book as a program basis. These to be discussion groups with an inspirational evening meeting.

e. In the local church the following simple but absolutely necessary program is suggested:

1. A discussion of the world-service program of the church with an acceptance of the apportionment by the quarterly conference or official board;

2. Public presentation by the pastor from the pulpit at definite stated periods when the great causes represented by the connectional boards will be given to the people;

3. Study classes, Church Training Night, and unit groups;

4. Instruction in the Sunday school and in the Epworth League;

5. The use of minute men, but not necessarily under that name;

6. A copy of the survey volume in every home;

7. Adequate preparation for the every member canvass.

f. We urge an immediate enrolment in the area offices of the chairman of the committee on apportioned benevolences in each local church.

g. The preparation of the educational material necessary to carry forward the above program.

h. Inspirational meetings, area, district, city-wide, as may be arranged in accordance with the desires of the various areas.

i. We recommend that a new name and a slogan be adopted. We propose

THE WORLD SERVICE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH

"I am among you as he that serveth."

"To Serve the Present Age."

j. We recommend that pledges be taken in 1923 for the first post-Centenary year only, and that we leave the determination of a permanent policy until later; this, however, does not preclude any individuals or churches from making pledges for a longer time if they so desire.

3. STEWARDSHIP

In the Discipline no phase of the Christian life is more clearly stressed than that of Christian stewardship, stewardship of life, of substance and of prayer as essential to the complete Christian life and not merely as a means for financing the program of the church.

These principles of stewardship are so fully set forth under the head of Special Advices in Paragraph 71 of the Discipline, that no word of explanation is needed.

Paragraph 182, Section 17, provides that every pastor shall teach the duty of Christian stewardship in accordance with these special advices.

Paragraph 108, Section 4, provides for a quarterly conference report from unit leaders and class leaders with special reference to intercession and Christian stewardship.

The church has been placing the emphasis upon the giving of the tenth. The greatest example in all history of a people's recognition of God's claim upon their possessions is found in the tithe of the Jews, and no better starting point for the Christian's recognition of God's claim upon him can be found than in the tithing system, as can be testified to by almost a half million of enrolled Methodist tithers, together with a great company of unenrolled conscientious givers, many of whom are tithers. Some definite proportion of our substance must be set aside for God; and history and our present-day experience point alike to the tenth as a wise minimum of endeavor.

While recognizing the right of every giver to designate his tithe, we nevertheless unhesitatingly express the conviction that for the most part the kingdom of God will be more quickly advanced by the dedication of the tithe to the regular enterprises of the church.

A new light is breaking and the church is coming back at last to the emphasis of Jesus. God has made us working partners in his plans for a new world, and he owns more than a tenth interest in the partnership. The other nine-tenths also belong to God. They are as truly his property as the tithe. We are stewards of all we possess. We are trustees for God of all our possessions and all our personality. A recognition of this principle is necessary to the world's redemption. The failure of professed Christian nations to recognize and practice the principles of Christian stewardship has delayed for centuries God's plans for bringing in the fullness of his kingdom.

God has honored our Methodism with a large share of the responsibility for the evangelizing of the world. The Centenary, which has been one of the outstanding events of the religious history of the world, is but the index finger pointing to the unmeasured opportunity for world conquest just ahead. "Our God is marching on" and we march with him.

To that end we call upon our pastors to preach and teach the gospel of Christian stewardship. We urge the appointment of a stewardship committee and the speedy adoption in all our churches of the unit system, or some equally effective organization, with a view to the forming of classes or units of tithing stewards. We recommend that the Council of Boards of Benevolence conduct its stewardship educational program through the duly constituted agencies of the church, and that bishops, district superintendents, pastors, quarterly conferences, and unit leaders commit themselves prayerfully and wholeheartedly to the promotion of this movement so vital to the progress of the kingdom at this crucial hour in the life of the church.

In the sphere of religion, organization of any sort is valuable just in proportion as it is vitalized by the Holy Spirit. "The letter killeth, the Spirit giveth life." All the mighty religious movements of history have been the outcome of prevailing prayer. From Pentecost to the present hour religious progress is a sure witness to the sincerity and urgency of prayer. Rejoicing in the spirit of intercessory prayer, which has ever been a Methodist habit, we urge a renewal and deepening of the prayer life of our people, personal, family, and public. Our God will be inquired of and entreated by his children. Answer waits upon such inquiry and entreaty. The world temper is indicative of prayer need. By many and devious methods the world is blindly groping after God. The Christian knows the way. It is by the path of prayer. Behind every method, back of all agencies, at the foundation of every human effort, we postulate the necessity, the primacy, and the efficacy of prayer. Without this we fail miserably; with it victory is certain, for ours is a covenant-keeping God.

4. EVANGELISM

a. Our supreme work.—Your committee holds with the thoughtful and devout minds of the whole church that evangelism is the supreme work of the church and that in its true and inclusive meaning it gathers up all other phases of our work. Methodism is only a spirit and method of evangelism. With any other dominant note we would not be Methodists.

We believe that the church should carry on the following four correlated activities simultaneously:

1. Evangelism, by which we mean conversion and vital Christian experience, including, of course, constant accessions to membership;

2. Teaching and training the whole membership, and as much as possible, the whole constituency, in intelligent piety, and in the total stewardship responsibility;

3. A broad, careful, intelligent call to life-service tasks;

4. An adequate, systematic, general financial program that will reach every member.

It is highly important that any church-wide program should so combine these activities that no section and no committee or commission can mistake the unity or can break the correlation.

b. The objective.—It is our conviction that the church needs to know and feel a more comprehensive definition of the meaning of the term evangelism so that it may have its full content and consequently its proper place in our thinking and working. It should include every method of winning men to Christ and every form of training men in the Christian religion. Evangelism is not complete when persons are converted and confess Jesus Christ as Lord and Master. All such should be enrolled as members of the church and be developed by many processes of Christian nurture and through considerable periods of time into full-grown Christians. No convert is safe outside of the church. He in turn must become not a lone disciple but a co-operating soul winner, for he must know that the kingdom is not to be advanced by mere addition but by multiplication.

c. The field.—The field is the whole world. The Sunday school is still the most immediate as well as the most promising field. Each church has also a natural constituency and that should be accepted as definitely as the enrolled membership of the congregation. We have included schools and colleges as accepted fields of responsibility. We should also include as fields of evangelistic obligation the so-called "neglected poor" and the "neglected rich." Further, we should give exact and patient effort to reach with a virile gospel all other distinct groups, among which are:

1. Business men's organizations and clubs;
2. Women's clubs and societies;
3. Labor organizations and working men;
4. Foreign-speaking communities;
5. Army and navy groups.

Such walls of separation are man-made and artificial and the chief purpose of the gospel is to bring together in one all of His own. Wherever there is one lone, lost man, we must bring him to Jesus,

d. Methods.—Never was diversity of method more needed or more justified. Congregations are following certain forms of effort which have become formal and inefficient. This church has no exclusive method, and no method that does the work is improper or irregular. Therefore we urge pastors and all official members not to allow themselves to rest satisfied with the use of means that are actually unsuccessful but to seek and to try honestly, diligently, and prayerfully till they discover some successful method for this particular congregation at any given time, and heartily pursue it. An annual growth of ten per cent must be the minimum expectation in every congregation.

These methods are proved and we commend them to the churches:

1. Systematic, organized, prayerful personal interviews;
2. Careful training and dedication of all child life;
3. Congregational revival campaigns;
4. Community revival campaigns;
5. Special campaigns in colleges, shops, and among workers;
6. Street and open-air meetings and missions;
7. Summer institutes and camp meetings;
8. Parlor meetings and other informal home gatherings.

Attention is again called to the great value of the special seasons as appropriate times to climax evangelistic efforts for a given period. Such are Christmas, Easter, and Children's Day. But short and occasional efforts of any kind ought not to relieve any church of its daily responsibility or any member of his constant evangelistic opportunity.

Church training night has become popular in many congregations. It should not be diverted from its highest purposes into mere social waste. We urge its more general use as a means of evangelism of the best sort, including the development of intelligent Christian character.

The call for a positive and a prophetic preaching ministry was never more timely than now. Sin is rampant and deadly; personal redemption in Christ Jesus is still the only cure. It is no time for pleasant platitudes or passionless plausibilities. Actual burning facts and witnessing, working Christian experiences and dedication to God are imperative. With such a need and such a gospel, woe to the watchman who does not preach the gospel of the redeeming Christ!

Nor are methods of recruiting the membership alone sufficient. The gospel of conservation is just as necessary and as heroic as that of conversion. Our Master kept those the Father gave him and lost but one of the twelve. The leakage and wastage in our membership every year are appalling and losses are so unnecessarily large as to show bad methods of church and pastoral care, if not criminal neglect. We need:

1. Greater and wiser care of new-born Christians;
2. Better methods of caring for newcomers in the congregation;
3. Systematic follow-up of indifferent members;
4. Increase in local church activities that will give opportunity to new members to exercise and develop Christian graces and character;
5. Increased conscience in keeping church records to prevent great numbers being "pruned" out instead of being lovingly followed up and set to work. There is too much eagerness to correct church records in order to affect financial apportionments and we have allowed ourselves to become complacent when members wander away and are lost. We count it a great event when one comes into the kingdom; we should count it a tragedy when one is dropped from the rolls of the church. Habits of indifference in this matter on the part of pastors or official members are inexcusable, if not un-Christian.

e. Agencies.—This or any other challenge to faithful evangelism will be mere words unless it brings forth a hearty and willing response from the pastors and lay leaders of the churches. Evangelism should be initiated by the religious zeal and loyalty of the local leadership, and there must be greatest freedom in methods and plans to meet those varied needs. If they fail the evangelism of that community fails. Plans, suggestions, and ideas may come from some general headquarters; but genuine and enduring Christian evangelism comes from the spirit of the Master and is near to every congregation of true worshipers. It cannot be brought by resolutions and indifferent consent of heedless official boards of quarterly conferences. It can only come by prayer and plans and sacrifice. There should be no "off years" of watchful waiting for it to break out in some unexpected quarter. Our loving Lord awaits a willing church.

Wherefore, trite as it may seem to some, it is necessary to say again that the chief pastoral responsibility of the hour that cannot be replaced by any other duty or delegated to another is the duty to lead the congregation in successful evangelism, and from this no pastor may be excused. Boards and bishops and conferences may suggest and plan and advise. Whatever results come from the efforts of conference, district or professional evangelists, pastoral and congregational evangelism in spirit and in fact is a supreme need of the hour and is the permanent work of the church. We raise no objection to supplementing this with gospel teams, evangelistic singers, or any other needed helpers. But it is never to be avoided as a pastoral responsibility.

The guidance of this work belongs to the regular, authorized leadership of the church. We urge and expect bishops, district superintendents, and all others to give such definite, hearty, personal leadership to this work in every area as they gave in the "I Will Maintain" campaign and other strategic victories of the church. These ought ye to have done but not leave the supreme task undone.

f. Our dedication.—For the evangelism of the world, our Lord came to earth, lived, taught, suffered and died on Calvary, saying: "I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

For this purpose the Holy Spirit came into the world and developed a world-saving church out of a mere handful of disappointed men.

For this purpose Methodism was called into being and began to preach that good news among the poor.

To accomplish better this purpose we have developed a great organization of connectional Christianity, that now carries the light of His cross to the remotest parts of the earth. Not a board, not a society or commission in the whole church in its truest purposes has any other task or objective, but is part of this high and holy purpose.

If in this purpose we fail, the whole structure of Methodist Christianity stands before the world as a once mighty temple now sacked and ruined. We are just now closing the celebration of the first century of that aggressive denominational life which has been so full of sacrifices, of achievements and of devotion to the will of God, all of which was so bountifully blessed by the Holy Spirit. The need for this evangel is today a tragic need. It is the last hope of the world. Expedients, social, political and economic have been tried and have failed. As of yore the multitudes are asking: "Sirs, we would see Jesus," and they will not be satisfied with another.

Therefore, we make this solemn and sincere dedication to the first task of the church:

That old and young, leaders and those led; in boards and commissions and congregations, preachers and people; by old means and new, and by means yet unknown among us, formally and informally; in church and school and home; in club and factory and on street; on special days, during special seasons and every day; in all languages and tongues and among all races and peoples and colors; with due humility and yet with a godly courage; we do again lay ourselves and as far as in us lies our congregations and our great Methodism anew on the altar of Jesus Christ dedicated to keep first things first and to go into the whole world preaching the gospel to every person teaching them to observe all His teachings. Fail if we must in other tasks; we dare not and will not fail our Lord in this.

5. NEEDS AND APPORTIONMENTS

Your committee recommends that a definite sum of $18,500,000.00 be designated and approved to be apportioned among the churches in the regular way.

The Committee of Twenty-Five received from the Committee on New Studies a statement of the legitimate needs and the no-growth figures of the eleven benevolent boards. These were discussed at length and referred to the sub-committee, who, in turn, resubmitted them to the boards for any possible revisions. The sub-committee, after full conference with the boards involved, again presented these figures to the Committee of Twenty-Five and they were finally adopted and made a part of this report.

It is intended that this list of needs shall be presented to the church in an appeal for subscriptions over and above the apportionment on the honor roll plan.

6. A CALL TO ADVANCE

What is the meaning of this figure that your committee has recommended for the apportionment? On the one hand we have the estimate of $28,045,173 as the legitimate annual need of the church for its distinctively missionary work and on the other we find that the amount necessary to maintain the work on an absolutely "no growth" basis is $13,885,172.70. Remembering that ours is a growing church, remembering also that "no growth" in work of this character is quite sure to result in deterioration, recalling our commission as a Committee on Advance Program and bearing in mind that the church recently pledged $21,000,000 and in one year actually paid $15,908,000.00, it has seemed to your committee that the amount named is a reasonable expectation of what the Methodist Episcopal Church ought to lay on God's altar in the first year of the new quadrennium. This plan will make it possible for those churches now meeting their full apportionment to continue and even to advance, and will also make possible an apportionment to many churches that will inspire them with confidence in their ability to meet the askings on a one hundred per cent basis and be a declaration of purpose to bear our full share in the sacrificial task of winning the world for Christ.

The program and achievement of our Centenary celebration has lifted the total thinking and giving of our church immeasurably. Horizons once pushed out can never be contracted. Moments of achievement are advance posts which the church will not easily surrender. The splendid advance of these recent years is due to the fidelity, the devotion, and the generosity of laity, pastors, district superintendents, bishops, and secretaries. The foot cannot say to the hand, "I have no need of thee." The whole body working together has wrought successfully at the task in the interest of humanity and for the glory of God. The very name of the Committee of Twenty-Five, a Committee on Advance Program, makes it clear that the Council did not expect the committee to sound a retreat and it is believed that the church does not desire a retreat.

In presenting to the Council, and through the Council to the church, this program of advance, the Committee of Twenty-Five desires to make crystal clear the fact that for the successful prosecution of the total task of Methodism, at home and abroad, the dependence must always be upon the local church, the pastor, the district superintendent, and the bishop. These are the foundation stones upon which the entire superstructure rests and must always rest. Your committee strongly emphasizes the primacy of these agencies. They are not the servants of the boards but per contra the boards are the duly constituted agencies devised, planned, and ordained by the representatives of the church in General Conference assembled, for the carrying out of the plans and the programs of the church.

THE THREE BASES—Present Work, Approved Needs, and Apportionment

	Present-work Basis	Approved Needs	Apportionment

Board of Education	801,227.40	2,302,683.00	1,500,000.00
Board of Sunday Schools	346,387.75	810,000.00	600,000.00
Board of Conference Claimants	55,000.00	150,000.00	150,000.00
Board of the Epworth League.....	118,827.30	176,800.00	175,000.00
American Bible Society.....	142,957.04	250,000.00	200,000.00
Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals	149,284.10	319,750.00	250,000.00
General Deaconess Board.....	50,414.06	90,000.00	90,000.00
Board of Hospitals and Homes.....	39,527.88	175,000.00	175,000.00
Commission on Courses of Study.....	45,000.00	60,000.00	60,000.00
Committee on Life Service	54,677.00	75,000.00	75,000.00
Committee on Conservation and Advance.....	792,000.00	865,000.00	865,000.00
	$13,886,231.77	$28,045,173.00	$18,500,000.00

In view of what has already been achieved, in view of the world need as outlined in the careful and scientific studies herewith submitted, and in view of the unquestionable ability of our people, we dare call the church to a simultaneous advance along the whole front:

1. In the supreme work of the church, to wit: The preaching and practice of the good news of Jesus Christ, with steady and insistent application to the totality of life;

2. In the enlistment of still larger numbers of the laity in all the activities of the church, to the end that that genuine Christian experience may be the prized possession and the daily practice of the great hosts of people called Methodists;

3. In the development and ever-widening application of the scriptural and disciplinary doctrine of the trusteeship of life and substance;

4. In the strengthening and enlarging of the work of the local church and in cordial co-operation with the various boards majoring in the home field;

5. In the extension and completion of the world service of our church in those lands where by order of the church our representatives are toiling in the face of difficulties almost unbelievable, and with a devotion as deep, a courage as heroic and a faith as sublime as the world has ever known.

Fervently do we pray—

*"Let kindle, as before, O Heavenly Light!
New messengers of righteousness, and hope,*

And courage, for our day! So shall the world

That ever, surely, climbs to God's desire Grow swifter toward his purpose and intent."

The world is my parish.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT

"World Service."—World Service is a new general name for the disciplinary apportioned benevolence of the Methodist Episcopal Church, adopted by the Council of Boards of Benevolence. It does not include the work of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society and the Woman's Home Missionary Society. Their institutions, mission stations and summer conferences are indicated and described in this volume because no account of the world service of our church would be complete without them. Their budgets, however, are not included in the World Service askings and apportionments because in the local church they are not officially combined in the benevolent budget and raised through the duplex envelope.

A co-operative effort.—This World Service volume represents that fine quality of co-operation possible in a great connective organizational organization like the Methodist Episcopal Church. Toward its preparation, missionaries at home and abroad, corresponding secretaries and department superintendents of the benevolent boards and agencies, presidents and deans of our educational institutions, superintendents of our philanthropic agencies, pastors, district superintendents, bishops, and editors of our church papers have all contributed a share.

Mr. Hutchinson wrote the foreign section of Part One. Mr. McDermott prepared the American section of Part One. Part Two was prepared in co-operation with the various boards and comprises the statements presented by them to the Committee of Twenty-Five and to the Council of Boards of Benevolence, with the necessary revisions.

Part Three was written in co-operation with the treasurers of the Committee on Conservation and Advance and of the benevolent boards and agencies.

Grateful acknowledgment is made to Gilbert Loveland for weeks of painstaking effort on the preparation of the copy for the printer and all items of makeup and proof reading; to James Grantham for work done on the maps, charts, and engravings; to Hiram G. Conger for assembling the illustrations from far and near; to Charles M. Barton for furnishing the statistics; and to Robert H. Hughes and the staff of the Methodist Book Concern in Chicago for loyal and devoted efforts on the manufacture of the book.

Neither the editor, the writers, nor any other person receives any royalties or extra financial compensation in the sale of this volume. The material is not copyrighted and maybe reproduced freely. Our hope is that it may have the very widest possible circulation.

Our goal is "A copy in every Methodist home."

A WORLD SERVICE PRAYER

O thou eternal Father of mankind, grant unto us, we pray thee, a heartening consciousness of thy presence. Thou only art our refuge and strength, our light and our salvation.

We have sinned and suffered. Help us to repent before it is too late to avoid further suffering. Deliver us, we beseech thee, from those selfish passions and bitter tempers that have wasted the wealth of nations, turned fruitful fields into a barren wilderness, dimmed the light in women's eyes, hushed the laughter on the lips of children, slain the sons in whom we had centered our hopes, and left us permanently poorer. Open our eyes to the folly of greed, to the madness of hate, and to the unreasonableness and wickedness of those prejudices that have separated class from class, nation from nation, and race from race.

Help us to make our own the motive of Him who came into our world not to be ministered unto but to minister. Help us to love even our enemies and to do good even to those who have hurt us. Beneath every difference of culture and color and creed, may we discover our common humanity and our growing dependence on one another.

Grant unto us a vision of our human world as it might be: no festering slums in which little children are denied a fair chance of life; no selfish industries in which material profit looms larger than the welfare of men; no hopeless poverty nor preventable disease; no wasting, embittering strife; but a world built securely upon justice, made happy by love, and enriched by the contributions of many peoples.

Help us in spite of every discouragement to believe in this better world. Help us to become willing to pay any price which may be necessary to secure it. May we resolve to give all we can to the end that the night of the world's sorrow may be shortened, and that a glad, new morning may dawn for mankind.

In the name of Him who is the inspirer and hope of our world service.

Amen
